BAe pays to save nurse's life – and trade

British Aerospace, the company with the most to lose from any damage to Britain's trading relations with Saudi Arabia, has paid the largest chunk of the "blood money" set aside to prevent the execution of Deborah Parry, one of two nurses found guilty of murder. The Independent has seen a copy of the settlement, which shows that the victims' nearest relative, Frank Gifford, would receive the £730,000 set aside even if the court does not eventually find Ms Parry guilty of 'intentional murder' — the charge which would carry the possibility of a death sentence. Boom in football fans

Stands at football grounds around the country are filling up again — and it's not the Premiership clubs that are driving the increase in spectator numbers, it's the clubs of the Nationwide League. More and more fans are returning to support their local team, according to our own survey of attendances so far this season. It suggests that the professional game in England and Wales is poised to enjoy its largest percentage increase in league gates for 40 years, taking attendances to their highest level for 18 years. Part of the reason is that fans cannot get tickets for Premiership games; 10 out of the 20 top clubs are always full. Time Out, Page 32

From Labour's rousing finale to a Tory wake

John Prescott, Labour's deputy leader, sent the Labour faithful home from Brighton yesterday with a rousing speech largely devoted to mocking William 'Just William' Hague, the Tory leader.

As we report, however, no one will be laughing in Blackpool next week when the Conservatives gather to contemplate their future: a surprising number of the Tory great and good have decided to stay away, sending a less than supportive message to the party they helped sustain in power over the past two decades.

Blood money, arms and politics: the Saudi deal

The British company with the most to lose from the execution of two nurses charged with murder in Saudi Arabia has made the biggest "blood money" donation to save their lives. Steve Boggan reveals how the women were spared public beheadings and how British businesses queued up to protect their own interests.

British Aerospace, Britain's largest defence contractor, was the biggest contributor to the "blood money" fund which guaranteed the lives of two ourses accused of murder in Saudi Arabia.

in Saudi Arabia.

F. Sources close to the deal confirmed yesterday that the company – which takes a huge slice of Britaio's £2.5bo-a-year trade with Saudi Arabia – was at the head of a list that included other defence contractors as well as private donors.

The mooey, $1.2m (£730,000), was paid ioto an account in Australia on Wednesday and will be released when Frank Gilford, brother of the murdered mirse Yvonne Gilford, fulfils two conditions of the blood-money settlement, seen yesterday by The Independent.

First, he must plead in writing for clemency for Deborah Parry, 38, one of the British muses accused of the murder. She awaits a Saudi court's verdict oo a charge of "intentional murder". Her co-accused, Lucille McLauchlan, has already been found guilty of a lesser charge and sentenced to eight years in prison and 500 lashes.

Second, Mr Gilford must make a statement to the court repeating assertions that his sister was not a lesbian. Confessions which the nurses say were forced out of them centre on a row which was supposed to have erupted because Ms Gilford ended a lesbian relationship with Ms Parry. The accused say oo such relationship existed.

British Aerospace refused to confirm or deny its involvement yesterday. It is currently delivering 48 Tornado strike aircraft and a oumber of Hawk and Pilatus training jets to the Saudis.

The defence industry was anxious that the crisis over the ourses' possible executions should oot affect relations between the two countries. It is understood that the Foreign Office played a major role in raising the blood money. Officials even provided names and telephone oumbers of senior figures in the defence industry and suggested that Jonathan Ashbee, Ms Parry's brother-in-law, ask them for money.

"They were incredibly helpful," Mr Ashbee said yesterday.

Among those thought to have made a donation is Vickers, which has been competing for a contract to supply tanks to the Saudis. Andrew Green, Britain's ambassador io Saudi Arabia, is a former non-executive director of Vickers. The company yesterday refused to confirm or deny that it had made a donation.

Salah Hejailan, the nurses' lawyer in Saudi Arabia, confirmed that the money was transferred on Wednesday to a client account at a firm of solicitors in Adelaide. It can be released to Mr Gilford only with the mutual agreement of both sides; that agreement will come when he fulfils his promises next week. A verdict in Ms Parry's case is expected soon afterwards.

Remarkably, according to the settlement seen by The Independent, Mr Gilford will still receive the money eveo if the court finds Ms Parry guilty of a lesser degree of murder than "intentional". In that event, there would be no possibility of either murse being executed.

"In an early version of the settlement, there was a provision that the money should be returned if there was no death penalty, but he insisted on keeping it later on," said Mr Hejailan. "Mr Gilford has made an abuse of the system ... He has treated it as an opportunity to make money and not simply to save the lives of two innocent women."

Mr Gilford will keep $500,000 of the fuod, with the remaining $700,000 being donated to a children's hospital in Adelaide.

Yesterday, details emerged of another murder at the King Fahd Military Medical Ceotre, where Ms Gilford was killed. The victim, Liberty de Guzman, was murdered in 1994. Both women were stabbed and beaten. In each case, a security guard vanished shortly afterwards.

ead: Chris Evans and Zoe Ball, who will be starting new jobs on the same day

Chris Evans heads back to Virgin territory

Radio One and their new hreakfast team by agreeing to front a rival show for Virgin.

The move marks the start of a ratings hattle between the two popular stations, with Evans launching his new show on the same day as Zoe Ball and Kevin Greening make their own debut,

He will be rejoined by members of his old hreak-fast crew including student Dan, Holly "Hotlips" and News reader Tina Richie will also rejoin the team after resigning from Radio One yesterday.

A spokesman for Evans said: "Radio is really his love. He's been doing it for 16 years, so now he's back where be loves to be. People will paint it as a war between him and Zoc, but it is not a war as far as he's concerned - Zoe is a good friend of his.".

Virgin's current breakfast DJs Russel Williams and Jonathan Coleman were unceremoniously axed yesterday morning and told not to come back on Monday. A stand-in will fill their shoes until Evans launches his show on October 13.

Vexed Londoners wish Sweet taste of success for rocket scientist

The hubbles in an Aero chocolate bar inspired a scientist with a sweet tooth to develop a low-cost rocket fuel. The idea behind the Space Quest Foundation's discovery came when full-time researcher Derek Willis, 37, hit through his favourite Nestle "hubble Today should see the first launch of a rocket powered by the fuel in an experiment being staged at a farm at Skipton, Yorkshire. "Fuels for rockets are particularly expensive, so we needed a cheap fuel based on oxygen and a kind of slurry," Mr Willis said. "I had this idea of forcing oxygen down through the slurry and then setting it hard.

"I was just chewing on this har of chocolate and the idea hit me. It's very simple in principle." Billions of hubbles are blasted into the oil-based slurry at 3,000lbs per square inch. The hardened formula, which the scientists have patented, can then be put into the rocket's chamber.

Aerated Solid Propellant, or Asprop, costs a tenth of the fuel used to blast the space shuttle into space. It could save United States space agency NASA about up to 6tl million dollars - about £37.5 million - per mission. Space Quest's six researchers, five of whom work part time, have a little workshop in Byker, Neweastle, and got together to get youngsters interested in science and technology. 'Danger' fireboard escapes ban Experts investigating the health risks of medium-density fibreboard said there was no evidence so far to justify banning the product.

Critics have labelled the versatile wood substitute used by millions of DIY fans the "asbestos of the nineties", claiming it causes cancer, sore throats and damage to the lungs and heart. But at the end of the first stage of a major investigation, the Health and Safety Executive said there was no need for urgent action to take the product off the shelves.

MDF is used throughout the furniture-making industry and by DIY enthusiasts to huild wardrobes, cupboards and bookcases. It is made of " wood dust and scrap, usually bonded in with formaldebyde - which is already recognised as a carcinogen. When it is cut, it releases dust which a is much finer than dust from other materials.

The HSE said as long as regulations were followed the product could be used safely. "Based on current available evidence, it is HSE's view that ... there is no need for a han on MDF." Although studies had shown al though formaldehyde vapour could irritate the eyes, nose and throat, some! d one cutting MDF was not exposed to levels at which it became hazardous. The regulations say exposure to the dust should he limited by the use of especially sensitive dust masks, dust extraction equipment and cutting material in well ventilated areas or outside. Although only workplaces are legally onliged to follow the regulations, the HSE said DIY enthusiasts, would also be well advised to take the same precautions.

PRISONS

Watchdog praises Group 4 jail

A privately run jail criticised by the Prison Service yesterday received a glowing report from the Chief Inspector of Prisons. Sir David Ramsbotham said the decision to designate Buckley Hall Prison, near Rochdale, Lancashire, which is run by security firm Group 4, as needing special man agement attention was "undeserved". But in a report on the jail he again expressed concern that random. drug-testing in prisons was driving inmates to use heroin instead of softer drugs such as cannabis. Sir David said he was delivering a "thorough-, ly good report" on Buckley Hall, which Prison Service chiefs had previously earmarked as a problem jail. "Nothing we saw suggested this was in any... way appropriate for Buckley Hall and indeed, not only is the stigma at tached to it undeserved, but, in view of the large number of prisons which are way helow the standard of Buckley Hall but have not heen made so subject, it undermines the credibility of the process.

Sir David hlamed earlier problems in the prison on a too rapid influx of inmates after it was opened in 1994. He criticised the way those difficulties were seized upon and exploited by groups opposed to private prisons on "ethical and political grounds". But he also expressed concern about the scale of the drugs problem at Buckley Hall which mirrored other jails

Both staff and inmates had suggested prisoners were switching from cannahis to heroin hecause it was detectable for a much shorter period, after it was taken. The Prison Service should complete research currently under way into the issue as a "matter of urgency", Sir David said. "If the results suggest the introduction of mandatory drugs-testing has affected for the worse prisoners' drug-taking hehaviour, then the policy to review drug ahuse may have to he reconsidered".

LEARNING DISABILITIES

Mencap battles to combat bias

Five years after changing its name, Mencap, the charity for learning disabilities, says there is "still n long way to go" before the public and media stops discriminating against those they support.

The name was changed from the mentally handicapped because learning disabilities was a less discriminatory and more accurate term. But in a recent Mencap survey almost 50 per cent of the public still described the charity as being for the mentally handicapped and 13 per cent believed Mencap to be a mental-health charity.

This demonstrates a large degree of misunderstanding around learning disability, says the charity. "People with learning disabilities are discriminated against in employment, when on holiday, through leisure and with a variety of services such as housing, the NHS and the criminal justice system. Only with real understanding of the issues can society hope to end discrimination as we near the end of the 20th century," said Fred Heddell. Mencap's chief executive. "We still have a long way to go to change the public's and media's perceptions of what people with learning disabilities Glenda Cooper, Social Affairs Correspondent

CRIME PREVENTION

Probation officer's tag warning

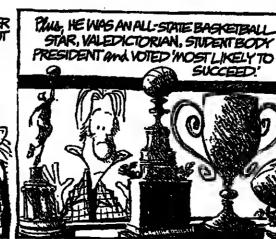

Electronic tagging of offenders could provide a cost-effective and constructive answer to crime prevention and public safety, according to a book by Kent's Chief Probation Officer, Dick Whitfield, based on research in the UK and ahroad. But if wrongly used, it could equally be an "electronic trip-wire" because offenders who do not respond are bound, later on, to end up in prison, even though they may have been tagged for offences which did not originally justify custody. Using the tag solely as a method of punishment as, for instance, in proposals to make it available able as a penalty for fine default, is a "very simplistic approach and like"; ly to be an expensive one". Dream of gene therapy comes a step closer Doctors of the future may use gene therapy routinely to cure cancer. A new trial from Canada may offer some hope. Charles Arthur, Science Editor, unravels the blueprint for a new cure.

The elusive promise of "gene therapy", in which cancers and inherited genetic defects could be treated by injecting replacement functional genes, may have begun to be fulfilled. A conference in Paris next week will hear that a Caoadian company has successfully managed to get new genes to seek out secondary tumours io laboratory animals. There, the replacement genes take over from the faulty genes which are allowing uncontrolled growth. Although the technique is in its early stages - it has only so causes Aids - because retrofar been demonstrated with "marker" genes, rather than anti-cancer genes - and would have to pass a number of clinical hurdles before being used in humans, it suggests that the multi-pronged approach to mucus. However, the results gene therapy may begin to pay have been disappointing, and off in a few years.

That in turn would mean relief, and perhaps even a cure, for thousands of people both with cancers and inherited disorders such as cystic fibrosis.

The new system has been developed by a Canadian company, Inex Pharmaceuticals of for the genes. Dr John Warner, Vancouver, and uses artificial head of Inex's gene therapy di-"packages" to carry the new genes to the disease site. stream. They contain a package of genes: in lnex's trials, these were tumour suppressor genes, which carry the code to make proteins which stop cells from reproducing wildly. The trials found that the genes' proteins were being produced in secondary tumours.

If the fiodings are confirmed, and can be carried over to humans, it will be an important step forward for the technique. So far, human clinical trials of gene therapy have promised much hut delivered little. The first ailment to be attacked was cystic fibrosis (CF). in which a faulty gene causes overproduction of mucus in the lungs, with fatal results.

One of the first trials attempting to use gene therapy to replace a faulty CF genc was carried out in Britain. It incorporated the gene into a modified retrovirus - the class of viruses including HIV, which viruses add their genetic material to that of their target cells. The hope was that the working CF gene would be incorporated into the lung's lining, and prevent the overproduction of success using retroviruses has remained elusive.

But the Inex technique of using fats, which is being followed by a number of other gene therapy companies, may eventually show more promise, even though it relies on an artificial package vision, said: "Today, one of the Jenny, who is visiting India with her mother and is taking part in Indian wildlife week during which she will travel to a tiger reserve, sald: "I hope very much that other young people will get involved in the campaign and that my visit will show that young people care about this issue. If enough people care and act on that caring then we can save the tiger."

Nine people were coovicted in July of crimes related to the petrol bombing of the shop. They included five juveniles who were seotenced to a total of 24 years and a seveo year sentence against 38-year-old Craig Wareing A number of the offenders are council teoants.

Mr Hussain, 43, is the only black person on the estate. He and Ms Livingstone. 49, sunk their savings into the store, fulfilling their ambition of owning their own husiness in a quiet city an easy distance from the Lake District and Lancashire's holiday resorts. But the shop has become a fortress under siege. The couple's perseculors have daubed graffiti, thrown bricks and petrol bombs and issued death threats, Mr Hussain said. "We have had gangs outside chanting 'If you want the Paki out clap your hands. If you want the Paki dead thump the seat'." Mr Hussain said yesterday: "Since moving to Rylands estate in June 1991 we have been subjected to cootinuous racist attacks, racial violence, racial abuse and racial harassment and intimidation. Nothing has been done to protect us."

Ms Livingstooe said; "I set great store on law and order. I thought if we went to the council they would do something about it. If they are saying they have done everything they can, why have they tried to stop the case coming to court?"

Leo Jasper, vice-chairman of the National Assembly Against Racism, said: "If those who have stood by while Mal and Linda suffered are not force to pay a price, then every local authority and every police force will know that they can turn a hlind eye to racial harassment."

Clive Romain, of the couple's solicitors; Bindman & Partners, said: "This is a very welcome and even historic ruling.

"Up to now the law has been unclear. Now the High Court has ruled that local authorities can be liable as landlords for acts of nuisance including racial harassment when they fail to take actino against the perpetrators."

Jail for gems-haul housekeeper who deserted toddler

A heartless housekeeper who stole a fortune in jewellery and then fied, allegedly leaving a helpless autistic toddler alone in the premises, was jailed for nine months yesterday.

Annette Lanigan-Ryan, 30, recruited through Lady magazine, had been working for her employer less than 24 hours before she found her safe was full of valuable watches and diamond-encrusted. jewellery. She pocketed the £10,000 haul, snatched £600 in cash lying near by and headed for the nearest pawnbrokers. When police caught up with her she was making one of her many visits to a casinn, Southwark Crown Court was told.

Mr Recorder Alan Hiltoo QC told the servant her dishonesty amounted to a "serious breach of trust". "It seems to me you lost very little time in deciding to take the jewellery and the money. "I accept the sight of the jewellery must have tempted you and that you have oever been in trouble before ... but this offence is so serious a custodial senteoce is inevitable." Lanigan-Ryan admitted ooe count of theft in July this year, was led from the dock

Her former employer, businessman's wife Mrs Toyin Kamgaing, from Kensington, Loodon, dismissed the woman's apparent distress as "nothing but crocodile tears". "I feel very bad about all this. The most important thing was not the jewellery that was stolen but that my two-and-a-half year nld daughter Zara, who is a specialist-needs child, who was left in the house all by herself with the front door open. She is autistic with oo concept of danger ... she could have had a terrible accident."

Earlier, Peter Lynch, prosecuting, told the court Lanigan-Ryan began her new duties by cleaning her boss's bedroom where the household safe was located. The barrister said Mrs Kamgaing later left the house leaving her live-in help to carry on with her work. When she returned an hour later Lanigan-Ryan had disappeared, along with the jewellery and mooey. Mr Lynch said officers tracked the deceitful servant to a central Loodon casino. Later, they found she had visited it no less than 21 times that mooth. Her home in Rowley Way, St Johns Wood, north-west London, was searched and a oumber of pawn tickets found.

Ford workers stage lightning strike over pay dispute

Production of Fiesta cars at Ford's higgest UK plant was halted yesterday because of a lightning strike by workers over pay." Around 60 workers at the Dageoham assembly plant in Essex staged the unofficial walkont yesterday afternnoo and they were later joined by other employees. The company said production of Fiesta cars and vans was halted because of the strike. The sudden walkout was believed to be a reaction to a pay offer made yesterday by the company to union leaders representing all of Ford's 20,000 production workers. The offer of a 2.75 per ceot rise this year followed by another rise of 2.75 per cent oext year was rejected by union negotiators who described it as an "insult".

Tony Woodley, chief oegotiator for the Transport and General Workers Union, said the company had failed to answer concerns about job security. He hoped for an improvement wheo the two sides meet again for further talks next month.

Closure threat for school that provides breath of fresh air for asthmatic pupils

Britain's only school dedicated to helping children with severe asthma and eczema is to close after 42 years. Parents told Lucy Ward, education correspondent, of the miracles Pilgrims School has worked.

Two years ago, Kabe Faulkner's asthma was so bad that she gasped for breath after a few steps uphill. When her family went on holiday, they had to take an extra suitcase just to transport the drugs and oebuliser she oceded to keep her condinon under control.

Today 15-year old Katie, from Colchester, Essex, is able to run, swim and canoe and has just gained a bronze award for trampolining. Instead of pulling a nebuliser mask over her face every two or three hours, she uses small hand-held inhalers whenever she feels hreathless.

The improvement, she and her family say, is down to her move to Pilgrims School in Seaford, East Sussex. Housed in a former school for children with tuberculosis who benefited from the sea air, the boarding school has, since 1955, been working educational and medical wonders for young asthma and eczema sufferers unable to attend mainstream establishments.

At the start of this term, however, parents and children were devastated to hear that the school is to close in December. I CAN, the small charity running Pilgruns, claims a dramatic fall in pupil numbers and a resulting operating shortfall of £400,000 a year have made the school unviable.

ough there is capacity for 56 pupils all of whom have access to round the clock medical care as well as a full education al care as well as a full education from 48 staff, only 21 places were confirmed at the start of the academic year. I CAN blames a combination of changes in the management of asthma and eczema, with an increasing emphasis on mainstream schooling, and severe funding pressures in local health and education services.

A statement yesterday described a "difficult decision taken with great sadness" but added: "Unfortunately to date nobody has been prepared to help us and we simply do not have the resources to continue to support the school alone."

Parents of Pilgrims pupils, who yesterday held a 25-strong demonstration outside I CAN's London offices, reject the charity's conclusion. They claim it allowed the school's profile to slip, doing too little to raise awareness of its facilities among parents of asthma suffers until it was too late. With each pupil bringing £28,000 annually in funding from their local education authority, a full school would be perfectly viable, parents insist.

Patricia Faulkner, mother of Katie, said the school had immeasurably benefited her daughter, who had been struggling with just three hours' home tuition a week after illness forced her to leave her mainstream secondary school. She now faces a search for a suitable alternative school prepared to accept her, but fears she will have to return to home tuition.

Despite yesterday's protest, the closure plans remained unchanged last night. The families are now considering whether they could take over the school themselves.

Rich may help the poor at Oxford

(Wealthier Oxford colleges may bail out their poorer neighbours if the government opts to cut the extra fee paid to collegiate universities. Lucy Word, Education Correspondent, finds the university considering whether students should be asked to make a further contribution.

legal advice over whether it could extend its "Robin Hood" system of redistribution of wealth among colleges if threatened funding cuts are implemented next year.

The university wants to know how far charity law will permit richer colleges, which already pay a voluntary "tax" to those with fewer resources, to use endowments to help those in greater funding trouble.

But it fears colleges' own charitable status, which in some cases bars them from running up deficits, could prevent them offering charity to neighbours.

The Rohin Hood option is under consideration as Oxford and Cambridge await a decision from ministers over the fate of college fees - extra funds paid by local authorities to colleges for each student taught.

Save Our School: Pilgrims pupil Nicholas Flint at the demonstration outside I CAN's offices in London yesterday

Sir Ron Dearing's report on the future of higher education, published in July, recommended a review of the fees, which help fund provision such as tutorial teaching, libraries and pastoral support within individual colleges.

Oxford colleges are devising contingency plans in case the fees, worth £18m annually, are axed. Cambridge, which gains £17m, claims it is concentrating on putting the case for the funding to remain untouched.

John Flemming, warden of Wadham College, Oxford, and chairman of the Conference of Colleges, said the loss of the full £35m could mean 1,000 job losses, academic and non-academic, hetween the two universities. That could have a devastating effect on the tutorial system, under which Oxbridge students are taught in ones and twos, which both universities consider crucial in retaining world-class quality. Redistribution of funds from rich colleges, even if legally permissible, would not be enough to save poorer neighbours if the full college fee is cut, Mr Flemming said. However, it might be viable if only a portion of the money was withheld by the Government. He added: "Everybody feels we are all in this together."

A further option being examined at Oxford is the possibility of charging future students fees to make up for the loss of public funding. The charges would be levied on top of tuitioo fees of up to £1,000 a year already planned

Doubt remains over whether asking students to cover for college fees would fall foul of proposed legislation to prevent universities charging top-up fees in addition to the standard tuition fee.

Oxford is also aware that it could not claim to be maintaining or improving access for non-traditional students if it charged fees without taking into account ability to pay. Mr Flemming said: "Any fee would probably only be paid by half the students, so in order to replace a £1,000 college fee you would have to charge a £2,000

Fast-track sacking for poor performance teachers

Around 900 teachers in England and Wales could be at risk of swift dismissal under rigorous new procedures for sacking incompetent staff.

Lucy Word explains how the unions are supporting a scheme that allows for the removal of the worst teachers in less than a month.

Doug McAvoy, leader of the National Union of Teachers, yesterday insisted that only a very, very small minority" of the profession would fall foul of the toughest sanctions in new competence procedures. He estimated that 900 staff curnently teaching were failing so badly they would risk being removed in just four weeks after a warning over their perfor-

: Mr McAvoy made his comments after six teaching unions had unanimously supported revised procedures, which are also backed by employers, governors and churches.

The proposals, which have still to be finally approved by ways insisted there are far few the schools standards minister. Stephen Byers, will slash the time needed to remove failing teachers from as long as two years to four weeks. At most, staff found to be under-performing will be given two terms in which to improve. Mr McAvoy, speaking on BBCI's Breakfast News, based his estimate of the number of seriously incompetent staff on the proportion found to be failing during inspections carried ont by the schools watchdog, Ofsted.

Out of 48,000 teachers whose lessons have been observed, 88 have been judged to be failing, scoring six or seven on a scale of one to seven.

Peter Smith, general secretary of the Association of Teachers and Lecturers, which also signed up to the new procedures, said that the overwhelming majority of teachers were committed and very hardworking. But be added: "If a small minority of teachers are calling that commitment into question, then we need to do something about that."

Despite their duty to protect members, unions are conscious of the need to weed out those who give the profession a had name. However, they have aler such staff than has been suggested by Chief Inspector of Schools, Chris Woodhead, who 15,000 incompetent teachers.

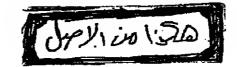

David Blunkett, the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, welcomed the agreement. "Parents and govemors and good teachers will be reassured that action will be takeo where it is appropriate, and that the emergency steps can be brought to bear within a month if things have gone drastically wrong," he said.

The so-called "capability procedures", published yesterday by the conciliation service Acas, are not designed to deal with problems of teacher misconduct or ill-health.

Where teachers are found to be failing to teach to an acceptable standard, they will be given improvement targets to meet. Despite initial opposition from unions, the agreement provides for the removal in four weeks of staff whose incompetence jeopardises children's

However, following union pressure, a category of "gross incompetence" proposed by local authority employers has not been included in the final

Private security firm brands people criminals

A private security company has plastered posters around a city naming alleged "criminals" and accusing the men and women of a range of offences including murder and drug dealing. The police say the move by SAS Patrol Group is irresponsible, and fear it could lead to vigilante attacks. The posters include addresses and photographs of the accused people. At least one man is considering suing the private security firm.

The posters have gone up in an exclusive residential area in the west of Bristol under the headline "WARNING". They feature people that the security firm claims are burglars, car thieves or drug dealers. One lists the names and addresses of thirteen men, another lists nine men and a woman. They carry details of the alleged crimes and hours of operation. One man is described as a killer.

One of the named men plans to take legal action against the firm. He strongly denied the claim that he is "a major receiver of stolen goods, the number one criminal in Sea Mills and violent". He said: "I will be seeing my solicitor about this. The worst thing I have ever done was steal a moped when I was 15."

Andrew Burke, who founded SAS Patrol Group, said: "I stand by everything that is on the posters. Let them sue me, the more the merrier. Everything on the posters is true anyway. I hope they've got van loads of money as I've got special libel insurance covering me for £10 million. I hope to make them all bankrupt.

Mr Burke said the information had come from his own security men and police officers who work in the area. An Avon and Somerset Police spokesman said: "We would not support this sort of action. We have found in the past that this sort of information is based on supposition and rumour." The incident is the latest example of vigil anti action by private guards. The Home Office is currently considering whether to introducing a licensing system for private security firms, which currently go unchecked.

Home Office pays £20,000 to Jamaican seized at Gatwick

A West Indian detained by immigration officers after arriving in Britain on holiday accepted £20,000 agreed damages from the Home Office to settle his claim for false imprisonment.

Peter Honegan, 32, a motor mechanic from Jamaica, was detained at Gatwick airport on 21 December 1993 after arriving to spend Christmas and the New year with relatives. His solicitor Louise Christian told Mr Justice Morland in the High Court in London yesterday that Mr Honegan, who had a return ticket for 17 January 1994, was taken to a detention centre. He was served with a notice refusing him leave to enter the UK and detained.

On Christmas Eve he was moved to a cell in Gatwick policestation. Ms Christian said: "On Christmas Day a High Court judge, Mr Justice Clark, granted a telephone application for leave to move for judicial review of the refusal to enter and made an interim order restraining the Secretary of State from removing Mr Honegan from the UK. Mr Honegan was granted temporary admission to the UK until January 17, 1994, and released from detention a few minutes after midnight on December 26, 1993."

Claude Moracs, of the Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants, said: "This case is important because Britain now detains more people under immigration powers, in the Immigration Act 1971, than any other EU country."

Sinn Fein to take oath challenge to European Court

Sinn Fein said yesterday that it was prepared to fight all the way to the European Court to win access to the facilities of the House of Commons after Martin McGuinness lost the first round of a court battle yesterday to challenge the oath of allegiance to the Queen.

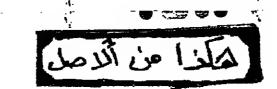

The party insisted it would not give up after Mr Justice Kerry ruled in the High Court in Belfast that the Mid-Ulster MP could not apply for a judicial review. Mr McGuinness had sought to challenge a ruling by Speaker Betty Boothroyd that he and Sinn Fein president Gerry Adams, MP for West Belfast, could not use the facilities of the Commons because they had not taken their scats. To take their seats the two men have to swear an oath of allegiance to the Queen - which they have refused to do.

The judge said the Speaker's ruling lay within the realm of the internal arrangements of the Commons and was therefore not subject to a judicial review. "The House is entitled to unfettered controt of its own internal arrangement."

Mutiny in the ranks sours regimental reunion

The issue of whether wives can accompany a dwindling number of Second World War veterans to a reunion lunch has led to something resembling a mutiny in the ranks. Tojo Moyes charts a peculiarly English battle.

Next Thursday will see the annual reunion of the First Household Cavalry Regiment, Usually, these gatherings are occasions for solidarity and goodwill. But this year it has become the unlikely battleground for a bad-tempered dispute between the Duke of Wellington and his old soldiers.

For the past 50 years, veterans from the Household Cavalry who served before or during the Second World War have been meeting at an annual reunioo at Hyde Park Barracks in London. Due to their age, numbers have inevitably dwindled, to the point where there was a question over the event's future.

Charles Farrow is a 78-yearold former Royal Horse Guards trooper from Sussex, who spends his retirement "ridiog a 3.5 litre V8 engine tricycle which terrifies small children, old ladies, borses and myself". At last year's event, he Duke to be pulling rank, and ofsiblings (and, optimistically, "live-in-lovers'), who had pre-Leriously been allowed entry to the barracks, but had to wait for the men in a separate room. His idea says Mr Farrow, received the "overwhelming support" of all the soldiers present. But following this decision, the place not in the trenches, hut via the Post Office. The exchange of correspondence has left Mr Farrow accusing the Duke of still behaving as if the men were his subordinates. Meanwhile, the exasperated representatives of the Duke have suggested that the "confounded" Mr Farrow stay away.

The dispute began in February, when Mr Farrow wrote to the regiment's dining club asking why "such a small change had been vetoed - I have always felt that it was humiliating, especially for wives, to have to sit alone in the har waiting for their menfolk to conclude their celehration".

The refusal, he claimed, could not be on security grounds, as women were allowed to wait in the barracks, nor could it be a case of sexual discrimination "as this would be against the law".

In June, the Duke replied. saying: "I am not prepared to countenance any alterations to the arrangements already made for this year's luncheoo." He took "great exception" that Mr Farrow should consider raising "a domestic and private matter" with the press, and asked him to desist.

Mr Farrow considered the "May I point out that it is now more than 50 years since any of our surviving members were subject to the rules and regulatioos of the British Army ... The fact that you seem determined to ignore is that an unelected cahal of just three men have seen fit to arbitrarily reverse the democratically expressed wish of our members," he replied.

For the Duke's representa-The ensuing hattle took tives, this may have been seen as something close to mutiny. On 31 July, Mr Farrow received a letter from the club's assistant secretary: "Dear Farrow (sie), Since our last reunion dinner you have proved to be a confounded nuisance, I have had enough! If you do not like what is on offer, the best option you have open to you is to stay away. Yours very, very truly ...

Mr Farrow did not buckle. Here was a man, after all, who had been "chased all over the Western Desert by Rommel", and wounded in Normandy.

"The tone and content of the letter that I have just reccived from you really worries me. I cannot help but think that you are losing your grip on things and I am truly sorry if the strain is proving too much for you," he replied. "One would have thought that, after 50 years, those of us that survive, from top to bottom, could think of themselves as a unified band of old warriors - comrades. Bound only by frieodship and no looger restricted by rank.

But it just aio't so." Despite the unpleasant tone of the correspondence, Mr Farrow said yesterday that there may be hope for a truce. He had just received a "commuoication" informing guests at the lunch that there would be a dison one item -- whether wives should be allowed to attend future reunions.

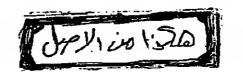

"I consider that I may have won the battle but not the war," Mr Farrow said yesterday. "In the meantime, another year will have gone by where the wives cannot attend, and there will be even fewer of us left."

ministers who resigned a week ago after revelations that they had paid back large sums of invalidly claimed allowances, or had covered up such repayments. Three civil servants also quit over their involvement, one of them Mr Howard's most trusted adviser.

Over the past few days, the government has turned the attack on to Labor, particularly Mr Sherry who comes from Tasmania. They accused him of claiming a total of A$43,000 (£19,000) for official stays in Hobart, the Tasmanian capital, when, in fact, he was staying for free with his mother. But Mr Sherry's suicide at-many MPs saw abuse of the travel allowance scheme as a way of making up for what they regard as their low rates of pay. A federal backbench MP in Australia receives a basic salary of about A$80,000 (£36,000) before allowances.

Campaign funds probe into Gore

The chief law officer of the US is expanding a judicial inquiry into the activities of Vice President Al Gore. It is claimed that his moneyraising efforts for the Democratic Party during the last presidential election broke the law. The decision could have serious implications for Mr Gore's future career, says Mary Dejevsky.

The decision of Janet Reno, the US Attorney General, to extend the inquiry into the Vice President follows an 11-month investigation into whether Mr Gore broke an 1883 law which limits the ways in which politicians may raise party funds. The main allegations concern telephone calls Mr Gore is said to have made from his White House office to solicit contributions to the Democrats.

According to US newspaper reports, citing White House telephone accounts, he raised millions of dollars from hundreds of calls made during the 1996 election campaign. The law makes it an offence to use federal premises for raising party funds.

Mr Gore - who has maden no secret of his ambition to suc. ceed Bill Clinton as president in 2001 - has admitted making calls, but insists that what he didwas legal. Bush gets German honour

Former US President George Bush, honoured by Germany for his efforts to end the Cold War, said yesterday that the country's unification had captured the world's imagination and paved the way for a safer future. Speaking at a ceremony on German Unity Day, marking the seventh anniversary of unification, he said the former Soviet leader, Mikhail Gorbachev, and German Chancellor Helmut Kohl had played important roles in reuniting Europe. But Mr Bush, president when the Berlin Wall fell in November 1989, said the Iron Curtain was not torn down by political leaders in Washington, Bonn or Prague, but by people who craved freedom.

Indonesia punishes log firms

Indonesia yesterday revoked logging licences of 29 timber firms implicated in fires responsible for choking smog across much of southeast Asia. The deadline expired on Thursday.

Second quake: hits basilica of St Francis

Another powerful earthquake rocked central Italy yesterday, causing more damage to the frescoed interior of the 13th century Basilica of St Francis in Assisi. The quake followed two similar-strength tremors a week ago which killed 11 people, flattened mountain villages and hrought part of the basilica ceiling crashing to the ground.

Yesterday's earthquake, which struck while firefigurers were working on the historic church to patch up last week's damage, caused part of the exterior wall just under the roof to crumble. The debris fell inwards wreaking further havoc inside the basilica. One friar was hit by falling masonry but no one was seriously injured. "The earthquake was shorter than the one on Friday (last week) but the damage before is now more evident than it was." Father Nicola Giandomenico said. -Reuter

Author unrepentant over Diana 'autobiography'

Author Andrew Morton has come under bitter attack for publishing transcripts of tapes made by Diana, Princess of Wales. Michael Streeter finds Morton insisting he has behaved honourably and accusing his critics of hypocrisy.

When it was published five years ago, Diana - Her True Storicaused a public furore and made a furtune. The updated version, due out on Mooday, is proving almost equally controversial and could lead to legal action from the executors of the late Princess's will. It will also prove very lucrative for Mortnu and his publishers.

The first wave of condemnation came last week over Morion's annouocement that the nriginal book had been in taken legal advice about Diana's own words and was in effect her autobiography.

But the fresh revelation that Morton has sold the transcripts of his interviews with the Princess to an American magazioe, People, for more than £100,000 has produced even greater nutrage.

They are said to form a devastating and intensely personal account of the Princess's engagement and marriage to Prince Charles; all in her own

Although the transcripts provide little new of substance, the shock comes in reading the hitterness of Diana's own words in criticising her husband and family.

Critics, who foclude MPs. churchmen and - reportedly members of the Royal Family itself, criticise Morton for cashing in so soon after the Princess's death and of subjecting her children to yet more details of their parents' unhappy

Diana's executors, who include her sister Lady Sarah Mc-Corquodale and their mother Frances Shand Kydd, have now whether they can stap publication of the transcripts and the updated book Diana: Her True Story - In Her Own Words.

- and the risk of prolanging publicity through the matter in the courts would dissuade the executors from action.

In any case it may be too late - early copies of the book are on sale in central London and People magazine is already on the news stands.

Last night Earl Spencer and his family were still consulting with Inwyers on "various points" and were said to be "very distressed and saddened" by the publication of the book-

Morton himself was unrepentant yesterday. Clearly irritated by the personal attacks from tabloid newspapers which have in the past fed off his words, he accused his detractors

Saying he was proud to have beco chosen to write the book, he added: "I think I have behaved extremely honourably throughout this episode."

Mr Morton, who is said to have made £4.5m from the original publication, defended making the transcripts public when Diana's young sons were still grieving.

Survivor of Paris crash flies home

Trevor Rees-Jones, the sole survivor of the car crash which killed Diana, Princess of Wales, one month ago, left hospital in Paris vesterday and flew home to Britain.

. The Payed family bodyguard was taken in a Harrods helicopter in an undisclosed destination, believed to he a convalescence clinic in the London area. French investigators said that they expected to travel to Britain to interview Mr Rees-Junes, 29, again in about two weeks' time.

with detectives, on Thursday, the former paratrooper was able to provide some fresh evidence on the chain of events leading to the accident in an underpass beneath the Place de L'Alma in central Paris in the early hours of 31 August, But, once again, he was unable to recall anything of the accident itself or much of the high-speed drive from the Ritz Hatel which proceeded it.

Sources in the investigation told Le Figaro that Mr. Rees-Junes had been able to identify, from phntngraphs, several paparazzi who had behaved aggressively towards Diana's party earlier in the day. He also confirmed that it was his boss, Diana's companion Dadi Fayed, whn devised a decoy plan to escape the phntographers. It was this scheme that put the Ritz deputy head of security, Henri Paul, at the wheel of a high-powered, armnured Mercedes that he was not qualified to drive. Mr Rees-Junes apparently said that he had been against the plan. Both Mr Paul and Mr Fayed died in the crash.

Autopsies un Mr Paul's body have revealed that he had been drinking heavily and had taken prescription anti-depressant and mind-calming drugs. Mr Rees-Jones says he showed no signs of intoxication or unsteadiness before taking the wheel of the Mercedes. The hodyguard also told detectives, according to Le Figuro, that Diana showed no particular interest in the arrangements.

Mr Rees-Jones suffered grave facial injuries and less serinus head and chest injuries in the crash. As is often the case with victims of head injuries, he is suffering from partial, and maybe temporary, amnesia. Yesterday he was able to walk unaided as he transferred between helicopters at Issy-Les-Moulineaux. He wore a large plaster-cast on his left forearm, his lower face seemed puffy and swollen and there were bruises around his eyes.

10/LABOUR CONFERENCE

Blair pays tribute to party progress

A hint of more money for the NHS was given by Tony Blair yesterday, at the end of his first party conference as Prime Minister. Anthony Bevins, political editor, witnessed a barnstorming end to the week

A rip-roaring speech from John Prescott, a fist-raising rendition of the "Red Flag" and a cool assessment by the Prime Minister ended the Labour Party conference yesterday.

After a week in which the leadership again suffered no defeats at the hands of its activists, the Tony Blair recognised that some party members were still clinging to the "old tunes", like renationalisation of

"I think there are some old tunes that get everyone going," he said in a BBC interview. "But I think what is interesting is that people know they're old tunes and no one really helieves, in this day and age, that we should go back to the ways of the past."

Nevertheless, he clearly sought to reassure party and public that be would do all in his power to avert winter crisis in the hospitals, saying that a close watch was being kept on the situation.

"I am not going to get into the positioo of announcing new sums of money," he said, "but we are putting in, of course, an additional £1bo over and above the Cooservatives' speoding plans oext year, and we're watching very closely the situatioo this year."

The Prime Minister confirmed that he was considering setting up a judicial inquiry into the introduction of BSE into cattle and the human food chain. "I doo't think it is right for me to comment until we make the final decision, but it has been the most appalling problem," be said.

In his wind-up, the Deputy Prime Minister ridiculed the Tories and their oew leader, saying that when they went to Blackpool oext week, Conservative representatives would be getting the result of their one-member, many-votes ballot for one leader - "Just William".

"William is running against nobody," Mr Prescott said. "It could be quite a close thing. But either way, let's face it, a nobody is bound to win."

He also said that the Tory party was rather like n "wonky supermarket trolley - it pulls to the left, it pulls to the right, but you just can't get it to go forward." Mr Prescott said Labour and the country should oever forget what the Conservatives bad done. But he added: "Now that we've won that famous victory, the most important thing is always to stay true to the people we represect, to deliver on our promises to the electorate." He said the Government could win the essential, second, five-year term of office to complete its task if it carried oo modernising and facing up to tough decisions. "This is about the hard choices of government, not merely the easy words of oppositioo," he warned.

 A further revelation about John Major's style of government has been delivered by Chris Patten, the former governor of Hong Kong, who says in an interview on Channel 4's Bye Bye Blues tomorrow night, that after he had seot him out to the colony, Mr Major occasionally asked him to give up the joh and come back - eveo though he was engaged in oegotiating the this year's critical handover to

"It was raised with me oo one or two occasions by him and by others," Mr Patteo says. "I think he would have liked it if I had been around to take some of the heat and the pressure off him."

Cabinet hint for Mandelson

A strong hint that Peter Mandelsone could be promoted to the Cabinet was: delivered yesterday by John Prescott, the Deputy Prime Minister.

Mr Mandelson suffered a setback on Monday, when rank-and-file mem-bers did not elect him to the party's ruling national executive committee; preferring Ken Livingstone, the veteran left-winger. Bot Mr Prescott pointed out yesterday that under a rule change pushed through in Brighton this week, while it was now impossible for Mr Mandelson to be elected to the NEC, he could yet be appointed to one of the new executive places reserved for members of the Cabinet.

The suggestion that Mr Mandelson might join the Cabinet caused some surprise - since Mr Prescott and Mr Mandelsoo have not been known as Labour's bosom buddies. "Sometimes we've found ourselves on different sides of the argument and we've both got the kind of temperameot where we express that," Mr Prescott told BBC Radio 4's Today programme. But he insisted: "We get oo all right ... There's no doubting the professional abilities of Peter.

The promise people are marching on Washington

More than half a million American men are expected in Washington today for a six-hour extravaganza of hymn-singing, prayer and contrition - in the name of Christian family values. To many, the rally is a sign of hope; to some, including some women's groups, it has a sinister

 $(G_{\lambda_{k}})^{-1}$

Roday's mass gathering in the Washington Mall, the broad thoroughfare more used to carnival parades and protests than prayer meetings, is called "Stand in the Gap", a phrase takeo from the Old Testameot prophet Ezekiel who "looked for a man among them who would build up the wall and stand before me in the gap on behalf of the land, so I would oot have to destroy it". Ezekiel "found oone"

The organisers, hoping to succeed where the prophet failed, are Promise Keepers, a seveo-year old organisation led by a football coach turned evangelist, Bill McCartney, that has grown from a core of fewer than 100 who attended the first rally in Denver seveo years ago to a nationwide organisation with more than one millioo members last year aod an income of almost US$100m (£62m),

Although its founder, Bill McCartney, like the majority of members, is white, ever age and ethnic group, who are prepared to sign up to seveo promises, which include "honouring Jesus Christ through worship, prayer and obedience to God's word", "building strong marriages and families through love, protection and biblical values" and a commitment to church attendance and participation.

Its supporters, of whom there are very many across a broad political and social spectrum, place the movement in a benign American tradition of male Christian movements, from the muscular Christianity of the early years of this century, through the Boy Scout movement.

They note approvingly that it lacks the racial element of Louis Farrakhan's exclusively black Million Man March of two years ago - with which today's rally is sometimes compared. So, thousands of men are committing themselves to Christiao and family values; what is so wrong with that?

Two things, according to its critics. One, especially for its female critics, is its male exclusiveoess and emphasis on male authority. If it is so serious about family valnes, they say, why is it that women are kept out? And - a concern, voiced stroogly by Patricia Ireland, leader of the National Organisation of Women - why the emphasis on female submission and obedience within the family? The Promise Keepers movement is seen by Ms Ireland and others as an attempt by meo to take back the ground that womeo have gained thanks to the women's movement, put womeo membership is open to all men, of what- back in the kitchen and make them subservient to their husbands. Bill McCartncy defends the movement's maleness by arguing that because men are at the root of so much that has failed in society, it makes sense to call them to account. Some female supporters of Promise Keepers say that the sense of responsibility and involvement in the family that men acquire when they join the organisation simply makes them better husbands and fathers and - despite the teaching that the husband is head of the household - does nothing to restrict the wife's freedom.

The other criticism is that Promise Keepers has a right-wing conservative agenda and is intended to be the fifth column of the religious right and the Republican Party for the next presideotial election, taking over where the declining Christian Coalition left off. Mr McCartney denies any political agenda, and says his anti-abortioo views are personal aod not imposed on the movement.

Io any case. Promise Keepers may just have peaked too soon to have a major political impact. Income and attendance at rallies this year has fallen by one third a decline that today's rally will arrest.

By yesterday morning, armies of professionals and volunteers were erecting huge screens and a giant platform on the Mall. Sandwich and soft-drinks vendors how many would turn up?

The Pope joins battle in Brazil's war of religion

ostensibly to push family values. Catholic church officials admit, however, that the pontiff is keen to stem the flow of Catholics to evangelical churches throughout Latin America.

As Phil Davison reports, both sides have called it a holy war.

Rio de Janeiro city authorities erased the offending red ink in time for Pope John Paul's arrival. But not before the defaced posters of the pontiff had shocked Brazilian Catholics.

At least half a dozen giant billboards erected to welcome the Pope oo Thursday had gun sight targets painted in red over his heart. Others were covered in the sort of graffiti that are routine in Protestant areas of Belfast but would have been unthinkable during the pontiff's first visit to Brazil, South America's biggest Catholic country, in 1980.

Thousands of Brazilian troops and police fanned out through Rio's hillside favelas (slums) before the Pope's arrival, detaining drug gang leaders for the duration of the pontiff's four-day visit. Beggars, the homeless and street children were moved to temporary, supervised accommodation.

The anthorities were concerned at John Paul's decision to travel past the favelas and to stay at the home of Rio Cardigal Eugenio Sales, perched oo Sumare mountain amid seven poverty-drug-and violence-ridden shanty towns. Stray bullets from the slums killed 33 peopie last year.

But stray bullets were not the main coocern of the 26,000 troops and police called in to protect the Pope. Catholic churchmen blamed the graffiti on "radical fuodamentalists", widely seen as a reference to extremists among the growing American-style evangelical churches in Brazil and throughout Latin America.

More than half a million members of various evangelical churches held a noisy outdoor rally in the city of Sao Paulo on Sunday in a clear effort to upe the hundreds of thousands now flocking to see the Pope in Rio.

Archbishop Lucas Moreira Neves said the anti-papal graffiti was aimed at provoking Catholics into a reaction and called on police to identify and arrest those who defaced the Pope's image. "Catholics are not bellicose, oor preoccipied with this holy war, but the lack of respect for our faith could prove a factor for reaction."

In 1970, 92 per cent of Brazilians considered themselves Catholics. By 1991, the figure was just above 80 per cent and may now be down to 75 per cent, pollsters say. Increasingly disillusioned with Vatican dogma in the face of the modern television world of soap operas, Brazilian Catholics have often become easy converts to evangelists who promise miracles and business success.

Recent surveys in Rio found 84 per cent favoured birth control, 76 per cent thought abortion should be permitted in cases of rape, 74 per cent thought priests should be allowed to marry and 54 per cent approved of non-marital sex. When the Pope came to Brazil in 1980, there were less than five million evangelical Christians. Now there are 15 million, 10 per cent of the population.

Bibi flounders in sea of troubles after Hamas fiasco

Israel has released Sheikh Yassin, the founder of Hamas, just as it was demanding that Yasser Arafat, the Palestinian leader, put Hamas leaders in jail.

Jerusalem is clearly already feeling the consequences of the capture of two of its agents in Jordan after a failed assassination bid.

Critics of the Soviet Union in the Eighties used to refer to it as "Upper Volta with rockets". Adapting the phrase, an thobserver in Jerusalem this week said Israel was acting like "Upper Volta with rockets and a Washington lobby".

No doubt it is very unfair to use Upper Volta as a benchmark for political underdevelopment. But the attempt to assassinate a member of Hamas, the Islamic militant organisation, in the streets of Amman, shows Israel as a country which, despite its armed strength and influence in the United States, is now responding to political challenges in a very primitive way.

The sheer zaniness of the assassination attempt by Mossad, of the Israeli foreign intelligence service, on Khalid Meshal, the head of the political bureau of Hamas, is only beginning to sink in. Even supposing it had succeeded and Mossad had got clear away, the death of Mr Meshal would not have crippled Hamas, which would probably have responded with more suicide bombs.

But if it went wrong; as it did, then the outcome was wholly predictable. King Hussem signed a peace treaty with Israel in 1994, which has never been very popular in Jordan. Suddenly he discovers that Mossad feels free to carry out an assassination in his capital. No wonder, going by Israeli press reports, he telephoned Benjamin Netanyahu, the Israeli Prime Minister, threatening to break off diplomatic relations and demanding the antidote to the poison used on Mr Meshal.

Israel then released Sheikh Yassin, the spiritual leader and founder of Hamas, to molify King Hussein. But in doing so it left its policy towards Yasser Arafat, the Palestinian leader, in tatters. For months Mr Netanyahu has been insisting - and has got President Bill Clinton and Madeleine Albright, the US Secretary of State, to echo his words - that Mr Arafat had to arrest members of Hamas. Furthermore, he was to destroy its "infrastructure" by closing Hamas schools, clinics and social services.

Now, just when Mr Arafat was complying, Israel releases the bead of Hamas, his prestige enhanced by eight years incarceration. It will be virtually impossible for the Palestinian Authority, in these circumstances, to keep Hamas members locked up. Nor will Sheikh Yassin take kindly to the continued closure of Hamas charitable organisations, which he helped establish and on which some 50-60,000 of the poorer Gazans rely.

Mr Netanyahu has so far been spared the repercussions. in Israel of the release of Sheikh Yassin and the failed assassination because of the start of the tanyahu authorised the mission. force them to back down.

Time off: Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu swimming in the Mediterranean on holiday in the summer, before returning home and continuing his policy of inflexibility in response to political challenges

Jewish New Year. But it is probable that he would have had to approve the Mossad operation. And if he did so, Israelis will ask questions about his judgement. If the uttack had succeeded he would have gained little. If it failed, as it did, then the consequences were likely to grave. Nor is the Amman operation the only one to have to have failed in recent weeks. Early last month, 11 Israeli naval commandos, the élite of the Israeli military élite, were killed in an Hezbollah ambusb far north of the Israeli occupation zone in Lebanon. They were reportedly there to kill a leader of Hezbollah, the Islamic guerrillas, though in this case they were betrayed by a Lebanese double-agent. Again the likelihood is that Mr Ne-for the previous government of Yitzhak Rabin, the prime minister assassinated in 1995, and Shimon Peres, his successor, to make the concessions they made at Oslo. Instead, the Arabs can be faced down. If they object then Israel can use its military superiority and political strength in Washington to

The attack by Mossad in Amman, the naval commando raid in Lebanon and the pressure on Mr Arafat to arrest all members of Hamas, show that Mr Netanyahu believes his diagnosis that "terrorism" against Israel is separate from real political grievances, Get rid of terrorism, he argues, and then

Israel will talk about peace. The truth is very different. Until there is a final settlement between Israel and the Palestinians there will probably be suicide bombs. Hamas did not invent them. They were used with massive effect in Lebanon against US and Israeli troops in the Eighties.

Indeed, Mr Netanyahu has himself ensured that suicide bombs will go on by saying that he will not implement Oslo if there are more attacks. This, of course, gives an immediate indesire to change, to adapt to the centive to those in Syria and Iran, who detest Oslo themselves, to plant a few hombs so Mr Netanyahu can serve their purposes by stopping implementation of the agreement. Probably Mr Netanyahu can survive the débacle in Amman. He is lucky that it happened just before a holiday in Israel. He can claim that the needs of national security prevent him from telling all.

But the image of Israel as Upper Volta, buttressed by nuclear weapons and an immensely influential lobby in Washington, is more than just a jibe. Acquisition of nuclear missiles was a great advantage to the Soviet Union in terms of the balance of power with its adversaries. But the confidence the missiles inspired stunted the Photograph: Roni Schtser outside world. In the same way Israel's nuclear arsenal and its Washington lobby makes Israel a politically rigid place. Concessions are denounced as an unnecessary weakness. Problems in neighbouring countries are handled by raiding parties - two of which have come so spectacularly to grief in the last month.

 Israel expressed regret over Canada's recall of its ambassador following the arrest of two men with forged Canadian passports in Jordan after an attack on a leader of Hamas. Canada's foreign minister Lloyd Axworthy on Thursday said the envoy had been recalled for "immediate consultations" and that Ottawa took "great exception" to the use of false Canadian documents.

US aircraft carrier sent to patrol in the Gulf

The United States navy has told the crew of the aircraft carrier Nimitz to skip a port call in Singapore and burry to the Gulf, close in an area where Iranian aircraft have hit targets in Iraq, and Turkey has carried out raids, the Pentagon said yesterday.

The Nimitz was on its way to the Gulf anyway, but by missing Singapore it will arrive by the middle of the month, four or five days earlier than planned. The triangle of territory wbere Syria, Turkey and northern Iraq meet saw a sudden escalation of tension this week, with Turkish jets attacking Kurdistan Workers Party (PKK) guerrillas in Iraq, and Iranian warplanes on Monday striking a rebel base near Kut, 105 miles (170km) south-east of Baghdad. Kut is within the part of southern Iraq that the US declared a no-fly zone to prevent Iraqi attacks on Iragi Shia rehels.

Yesterday, Syria and Iran deployed troops near the Kurdish enclave in northern Iraq raided by Turkey, "There is information that Syria ... is carrying out a deployment only 30km from where our border meets northern Iraq," Turkey's semi-official Anatolian news agency said. "Iran continues to deploy troops along its border with northern Iraq."

The London-based Iraqi opposition group Iraqi National Congress (INC) confirmed the deployments.

Around 15,000 troops, backed by air power, are taking part in the Turkish raid, the second major strike into Iraq this year.

The BBC is responding to the digital revolution - and devolution - by flying a hot air balloon across the United Kingdom. Rob Brown, Media Editor, says it is not as daft as it sounds.

The BBC is determined to more than match its commercial rivals on this front and ensure that its television and radio networks maintain a stroog profile in a fast fragmenting media marketplace.

Which is why from 6am today viewers who tune into BBC1 will, in between programmes, start to see a big bright red globe-shaped balloon floating above Eilean Donan Castle, Canary Wharf, Cardiff City Hall and seven other distinctive landscapes and cityscapes across the UK.

Schoolboy or City gent, conkers players all search for the secret of a tougher nut

Science joins search for a conkering hero

It's a tough out that even scientists find hard to crack: what should you do to cnsure that you have a winning conker, which when drilled and threaded on string will beat off all comers?

It is not a trivial question: for example, the World Conker Championship, being held tomorrow outside Nottingham. are expected to attract 800 people, all of whom take their sport deadly serionsly.

But should you pickle it in vinegar, or bake it in an oven, or both? Or is there another answer?

Readers of New Scientist magazine reckon that they know. In reply to an anguished query asking "Which method produces winning conkers, and why?" the scientific readership was quick to respond. "Do not put your conkers in vinegar," advised Patrick Wigg of London sternly, explaining that though this hardens the shell it can weaken the flesh - "making the conker useless." He advised baking at Gas Mark 1. (The Independent's executive oews editor has determined empirically that this causes raw conkers to explode.)

"I always soak them io vinegar," said Michael Dutton, of Gloucester. "This hardens them into champion conkers." However, he admitted that: "I was cootent with this method uotil a few years ago when I was bealen by someone who had smeared his conker in Oil of Ulay. Apparently, this made the conker more malleable, allowing it to absorb the impact of my prize pickled nut."

Nick Aitchisoo said: "Pickling rots the inside. Varnishing is also ineffective (and readily detectable)." Instead, he - and at least two other respondents - recommend laissez-faire: put your conker in a drawer for a year and leave it alone. "The older they are, the harder they are."

Such as show of scientific indeterminism has apparently proved too much for New Scientist. "As such disputes are an essential part of the sport, we leave the question with the totally contradictory answer given," wrote the editor. But, presumably, it'll be back next year.

Man freed after RUC murder charges dropped

Republican to seek compensation from the DPP after being cleared for the second time in a year in connection with terrorist killings.

A man walked free from a Northern Ireland court yesterday after a double murder charge against him was dropped and then he condemned the system which put him hehind bars for the second time for a crime he did not commit.

Colin Duffy, 29, has instructed lawyers to seek compensation after the Director of Public Prosecutions dropped charges of murdering two Royal Ulster Constabulary

The officers were shot dead by the IRA in his home town of Lurgan, Co Armagh during the summer.

It is the second time that Mr Duffy's name has been cleared in connection with terrorist killings. In September last year, he was released from prison after serving three-and-ahalf years when the Court of Appeal quashed a life sentence for murder.

A week after the amhush of the two policemen on 16 June this year Mr Duffy was arrested for a second time, despite protesting his innocence.

After walking free from the magistrates' court at Lisburn, Co Antrim, where the charges were withdrawn following an action earlier in the Northern Ireland High Court, Mr Duffy expressed his delight at being free - hut anger at having been arrested in the first place.

"My reaction is quite plain and simple. obviously I am delighted at being released," he said, adding that once again he had been arrested for something he had not done.

"It is an indictment of the system as a whole, from the RUC right through to the courts. Until this system is changed there isn't going to be any justice in this part of Mr Duffy claimed that the case against him had been manipulated and he said he felt "a lot of anger and frustration at the

He added: "It has taken over three months to get me released. The evidence hasn't changed since the moment I was arrested.

The DPP decided to drop the case against him after the credibility of an unnamed female witness who allegedly wilnessed the murders was questioned. Mr Duffy said that he did not feel anger towards the woman, but sympathy. "I know what the RUC are like. I don't blame her for it at the end of the day," he said. Mr Duffy said that he had been arrested hecause he was a republican, adding "that's all that is needed". His solicitor Rosemary Nelson confirmed that she had been instructed to begin civil action over the case. This matter has caused the gravest concern in legal circles, amongst internationrepresentatives," she said. Mr Duffy's pregnant wife, Susan, who lives with her eight year old daughter. Catrina, in Lurgan's republican Kilwilkie estate, said; "Collie is a republican, but that doesn't mean he should be arrested for everything that happens in this town." Sinn Fein said the release of Mr Duffy confirmed that there had been a concerted and vindictive campaign against him and

The party's northern chairman, Gerry O hEara, said that people should now be left in no doubt about how corrupt the police and judicial system was.

A former boyfriend of the barmaid who claims to have been gang-raped by six soldiers yes-terday told how she stopped him hunting down the men hours after the alleged assault. The man, a former boyfriend of the 23-year-old woman, said he hecame angry when she returned in tears late on the night of 23 May last year to the flat they shared. He told Oxford Crown Court: "She was red and had clearly been crying. I asked where she had been but she just dashed into the bathroom. I began talking to her friend who was with her but was told she just wanted to be by herself. She then came hack into the room and said she was sorry she had been away so long.

The prosecution alleges that six soldiers took turns to rape the woman after sharing a sauna with her at the Royal Military College of Science, Shrivenham, Oxfordshire.

Gangs take over the drug-flooded Flats of South Africa

A year after pictures of Muslim yigilantes publicly executing gang leader Rashaad Staggie were transmitted around the globe, open warfare has broken on the Cape Flats.

As innocents die, the South Airican police are impotent in the face of crisis.

Now was the time to light a candle against the darkness, the vigil organiser told the hundreds of terrified residents who filled Cape Town's City Hall.

They came to seek refuge from the violence-ridden Cape Flats, home to the city's poor coloured (mixed race) population. Even as the choir burst into song and the wax began to drip, the war between gangsters, who control the Flats, and the Muslim vigilante group Pagad continued, with tit-for-tat attacks on mosques and alleged drug-dealers' homes.

It is more than a year now since the conflict first burst on to our television screens with the horrific public torching and execution by Pagad supporters of Rashaad Staggie, 40, who with his twin Rashied headed the Hard Livings gang.

Since then Pagad has continued its war with the gangsters who flood the Flats with mandrax, dagga (cannabis) and harder drugs. Once, Pagad supporters marched in their thousands to the homes of dealers chanting "Allah is great" and demanding that they leave the neighbourhood. Now they have become urban guerrillas, turning up, masked, in the dead of night, to assassinate dealers. They are spurred on by the calls of spiritual leaders who declare that "the time for killing" has come.

Herman Kriel, premier of the Western Cape, warned recently that Pagad had become as much a threat to order as the

In the last few weeks it is the innocents who have died in even greater numbers than usual. A baby was burned to death in a grenade attack which also blew off her older brother's leg and badly burned her mother and sister.

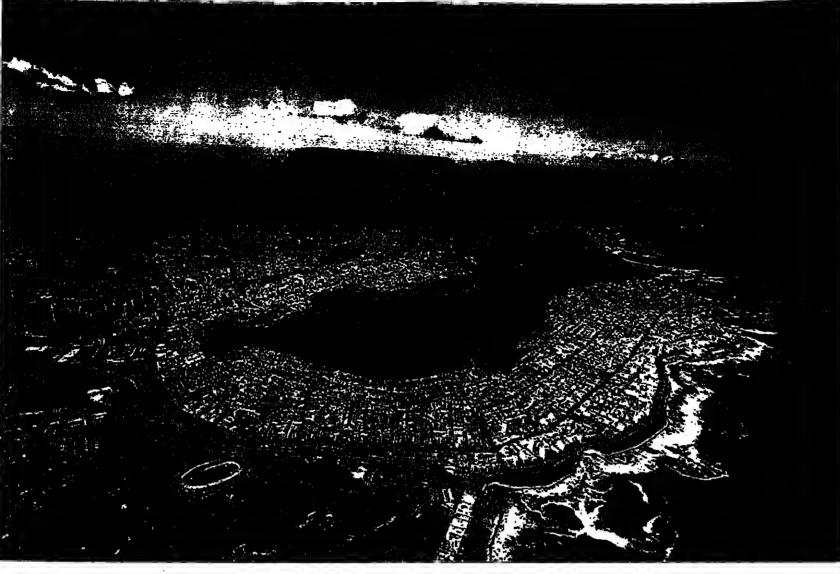

Despite Pagad's insistence that it was not responsible for the death and injuries, police say the vigilantes mistakenly targeted the family; the local mandrax dealer lived further up the street. In another incident Pagad beat and shot a man they mistook for a dealer.

If the vigilantes are mis-bitting, so too are the gangsters. Last week Dr Mogammat Dharsey was shot dead in his practice surgery. A gang had apparently assumed that he was a Pagad member just because he had attended the funeral of a friend who was. Muslim traders are also being killed because the gangsters believe that they are funding Pagad.

The violence, which has so far been contained to the sandy flats to which tens of thousands of coloureds were banished during the apartheid years, is spiralling out of control. It now poses a real threat to South Africa's blossoming tourist industry.

The government is struggling to find a solution. Last week 300 extra policemen were promised for the area, although only 70 actually arrived.

Publicly, ministers refuse to negotiate

The trouble is that in this drama none of the main players - Pagad, the gangsters or the police - are what they seem to be.

The birth of Pagad has BY MARY alllowed the gangs to present themselves as vic-BRAID tims. Once-bitter rivals have banded together to form Core (Community Outreach Forum) and a Third Force is inflaming the violence, afthat the government deal with them as the creation of a racist past.

Apartheid, according to Rashied Staggie, made the gangsters. "We did it to survive," claimed Rashied, who argues that dealers will pack up shop if the government creates employment on the Flats.

From their local shebeen headquarters, Core adapts Marxist class analysis to present its members as downtrodden members of the coloured working class and Pagad as middle-class Islamic intellectuals who have no notion of what it takes to survive. Playing on the alienation of a coloured population which believes it was "never white enough for the Nats and now not black enough for the ANC", Core says that the new government does not care for the coloured community. The gangsters' reinvention of themselves is disingenuous. Handsome Staggie, in designer jeans and mirrored shades, drives around in a flash four-wheel drive and owns property all over the Cape. Pagad argues, rightly, that the drug barons have grown rich by inflicting misery on the poor. But it faces a hard battle for hearts and minds.

Rashled Staggie, labelled as a psychopath in prison, is seen as a modern-day Robin Hood by an ambivalent community. And while Pagad can bring thousands of ordinary people on to the streets, so too can the gangsters. "He drives past local schools throwing 10 rand notes to the kids." said one local community worker. "He pays people's rents and provides local jobs." Like any prominent businessman he sponsors the local football team.

Staggie can afford the best that money can buy, including, it is rumoured, public relations consultants. He has taken to speaking at school assemblies where he tells children that he has given up the drug trade and warns them to shun the gangs.

Heart-warming stuff, but hogwash according to Pagad's national commander, Aslam Toefy. "Core is nothing but an organised crime syndicate," he said, adding that lighting candles is no protection against crime.

Wilfred Scharf, a criminology professor at the University of Cape Town, concurs that Core, hemmed in by new anti-gangster laws, is trying to protect a business which has enjoyed considerable growth since the end of apartheid opened South Africa up to the international drug trade.

Unfortunately, the expansion came just when the criminal justice system - and the police in particular - was in transformation and least able to cope. The police combating the war on the Flats are hampered by the corruption that riddles their ranks. Many officers have long-standing ties with the gangs which were used by both sides during the apartheid years. "Favours are still owed and information still has to be suppressed," Professor Scharf said.

In this mire the government - and the honest cops - must find some light. Third Force investigations may not be that outlandish, "It would not surprise me and I am not a conspiracy theorist," Professor

Diana A Tribute People's Princess

Peter Donnelly

This remarkable new book tells the complete story of Diana's life, much of it in her own words. There are more than 200 wonderful pictures that take us from the little girl growing up in an atmosphere of privilege tinged with sadness to the historic and moving funeral for four nation's golden child'. Author Peter Donnelly draws a brilliant picture of a compassionate and often misunderstood young woman who was to find happiness at last before such an untimely and tragic death.

Includes tributes from her family and leading world figures.

As part of a special pre-publication offer available only to our readers, you can order this 144-page, large format full colour hardback for just £7.99 - inclusive of p&p, by filling in the form below.

Britten's Henry James opera 'The Turn of the Screw' was premiered in Venice in 1954. It finally made its Royal Opera debut on Thursday night, as did the production's director, Deborah Warner. So how did the ghosts of Bly take to the Barbican stage?

The kiss which Peter Quint tenderly plants on the forehead of the dying boy Miles in the closing moments of Deborah Warner's new production of Benjamin Britten's The Turn of the Screw will of course be misconstrued by those who insist upon trawling through the composer's private life in search of contemporary answers to this opera's many questions. To others, it will come as a benediction, a fond but chaste farewell to innocence, to youth, to life and love misspent. Warner has a lot - a whole lot - to answer for. Which is precisely why her production (the Royal Opera's first of this piece) is so intriguing. And compelling. And provocative by virtue of not being provocative. Ambiguous without striving to he. Scary because it's ambiguous. Like Henry James. Warner doesn't run from the uncomfortable questions that this story poses, nor does she underline or seek to answer them. She torments us with them. And that is scary.

So what are those questions, and why do they unsettle us? What exactly was the relationship between Quint and the previous governess. Miss Jessel? (Remember Michael Winner's film The Nightcomers, with its sado-masochistic overtones?) How exactly did Quint "make free" with Miles? (His words, "I'm all things strange and bold", suggest a wild one, a bit of a rebel.) Were Quint and Jessel simply the unacceptable face of permissiveness and promiscuity, robbing their young charges of their innocence, awakening in them the first stirrings of puberty? Could be. Such things were not spoken about, let alone flaunted, in the England of James's novella. Better yet, though, is the eerie tale simply a projection of the new Governess's own erotic fantasies? Is she the victim of a powerful infatuation with her employer - the children's unseeo guardian? Could be. In the scene where the Governess is first alone with her new surroundings, lolling about on the lawn, feeling, perhaps, a certain inexplicable "arousal", wishing her emplayer were there to see how well she was doing, the hint of rapture, the charge of excitement in her words (and the way in which

Lost souls in a labyrinth of desire

ment that she first sees Quint and believes him to be the children's guardian.

It's a significant case of mistaken ideotity (or is it?) and Warner goes for it with intent by placing Quint at such close proximity to the Governess (not "distant", as prescribed, not some fuzzy apparition in one of the house's high towers) that he is at once tangible, real, hers. And you can smell the fear and self-loathing, the guilt. The feeling that she, not Quint, is the intruder, the interloper, gives the whole scene, the whole opera, an interesting new perspective, an extra twist, a further turn.

It's the could-bes of this staging that make it so intriguing. The world we enter, a dead, dread space, trees nestling uncomfortably in a concrete, scaffolding-clad shell (set design: Jean Kalman and Tom Britten sets them as a fragrantly erotic pas- Pye), appears like some sort of halfway succeeds in making Britten's action torale) is inescapable. And it's at that mo- house between this world and the next. The mas (free and adventurous as Quint is wont ing up too soon.

tall, thin, louche figure (an ethereal Ian Bostridge) who silently makes his way through the darkness, from a door upstage to the incongruous grand piano downstage, belongs here. So the "ghosts" move freely, casually, through this environment. shadowing, "parenting" the children (whose own sense of reality is unhindered) while their protectors look on. Quint is no longer just a shadowy figure, but in the room with the Governess, vindictively knocking over a vase of flowers in order to make his presence, his displeasure, felt. He helps make up Miles's bed, for heaven's sake.

He is suog - wonderfully and with immaculate diction - by Ian Bostridge, who to be) at once beautiful and subversive (all those near-quarter-tones). Physically, he is an adornment, draping himself around the production.

In Vivian Tierney, we have a singer and a performance almost 100 good, 100 intense, for the underwritten role of Miss Jessel; in Jane Henschel, the kindly, well-meaning hut stupefyingly straight-laced Mrs Grose assumes almost Wagnerian proportions - a thrilling amplitude. Joan Rodgers is the Governess, trapped in her labyrinth, unable to keep a handle on her authority, and singing (splendidly) on the edge of an ecstasy she cannot, dare not, reveal. The children - Pippa Woodrow (10) and Edward Burrowes (12) - are terrific. Flora spinning deliciously out of control in a perpetual flurry of curtsies and cart-

The real miracle of Britten's masterpiece, though, is in the resourcefulness, the atmosphere, the shifting subtexts of the instrumental writing. Clarity and ambiguity co-exist in his timy orchestra. You could take away the voices, you could take away Myfanwy Piper's sometimes preposterously fanciful text, and still keep Henry James alive. With Colin Davis at the helm you certainly could.

But Warner takes us still further into this psychological labyrinth. She turns a huge, uninviting space into a small, dark recess somewhere at the back of the imagination. With a little help from lighting designer Jean Kalman, the shadows are suffocating. bring "good karma" to the huilding. Even more mystifying to future generations (and visiting Martians) will be Mr Serota's fountain pen. But perhaps they will see what we may not: that this is the pen that signed the sponsorship deal for the Turner Prize and signalled the rise of installation art over painting. It is a piece of conceptualism all by itself:

The autobiography of the late Sir Georg Solti has been rushed out . following the conductor's death last month. It is described as "candid". But, for the most candid revelations: we may have to wait for the outtakes. As publishers Chatto admit: He was much more candid about his love life originally. But he, his wife Valerie and the editor read the proofs and took some pieces out."

The musical vignettes, however, remain intact. Solti recalls how he once asked Stravinsky why he had changed the orchestration and simplified the score of The Rive of Spring 30 years after it was first published. Igor candidly replied: "Because I couldn't conduct the original - it was too difficult for me."

Solti also met Sybil, Marchioness of Cholmondeley, who'd been at the 1913 Paris premiere of The Rite - a real riot, by her account: "Such fun! We jumped on stage and attacked the dancers with our umhrelias." An excellent means of heckling -demonstrative and painful, yet refined in the classical manner.

THE FILM

Volcano

This year's second volcanic disaster movie lays waste to LA. The fact that there isn't a volcano anywhere nearby hasn't deterred the scriptwriters; lava gushes from between the city's shifting tectonic plates. Tommy Lee Jones plays the crisis manager who has to deal with this geological novelty. Expat Brit Mick "The Bodyguard" Jackson directs. On general release.

Not a complete disaster, thought Adam Mars-Jones, even if it is haphazardly constructed. "The humour works best when it isn't spelled out," he concluded, "the building of the American Lung Foundation, for instance, wreathed in smoke". The Telegraph admired Jones's blend of heroism without narcissism. "If an actor can walk through a film without stretching himself and still be magnificent, he does so." "Many filmmakers have used LA's geological instability as a metaphor for moral uncertainty," mused The Guardian. Not here. Volcano "settles for a one-dimensional view of the most significant city of our time".

The Invention of Love

THE PLAY

Richard Eyre bows out from the National by directing Tom Stoppard's new play. The Invention of Love deals with the poet AE Housman's unrequited desire for his Oxford contemporary Moses Jackson. Old Housman meets his younger self, Oscar Wilde flits by, and Stoppard's familiar preoccupations with language and memory abound. In rep at the National Theatre, 0171-928 2252.

Paul Taylor was bowled over: "I have probably made this work seem less witty and diabolically clever than it is," he concluded. "But it was the emotion that got me." Like most of the critics, he praised John Wood's performance as old Housman. The meeting between old and young Housman was "almost unbearably moving". The Financial Times agreed: "Some of the finest, most passionate, and most disarmingly brilliant dramatic writing that Stoppard has given us," it raved. But The Guardian was less sure: "Stoppard at his best and worst. The Latin learning is laid on with a trowel. At the same time the jokes are very funny."

We expect Stoppard to appeal to the head, but here he conquers the heart as well.

THE CONCERT Bob Dylan

Boh Dylan's British appearances were cancelled earlier this year after he collapsed with a heart complaint. But you can't keep a rock legend down. He began the week by playing in front of the Pope, before kicking off his UK tour in Bournemouth. After enduring years of shambolic, rambling, mutter-filled gigs, his fans were hoping for a renaissance. Playing Wembley tomorrow (0181-900 1234).

"He disappointed in giving us what he thought we wanted," complained Nick Hasted. "Singing some of his finest work, he seemed uninterested in its meaning". Not so, argued The Guardian: "Dylan seems to have rediscovered the notion of melody, and was making sincere efforts to sing and not croak ... we had better make the most of this new, super-charged Dylan, because it may not last." "I never realised that a Bob Dylan concert could be such fun," enthused The Telegraph, even if the singer did sound at times "like a camel with a frog in its throat". Lively stuff, agreed The Times. "Drawing the pension is clearly the last thing on his mind".

Nice to find him putting a bit of effort in for once, even if it is strange to see rock's great miserabilist looking so checry.

THE WEEK ON RADIO ROBERT HANKS

The great history mystery unexplained

"The past is difficult," stated the protagonist of The House of Doctor Dee (Radio 4. Monday) at one point. A trite remark, not especially well put, but at least it's unarguable. The past is the one foreign country we can never hope to visit; we must construct our picture of it using unreliable and often contradictory information, mostly gleaned from guidebooks written by people who have never been there - ur. at best, have a confused recollection of its fringes.

Oddly, though, and also a little annoyingly, The House of Doctor Dee was constructed around the opposite view: here, time is an illusion, the centuries reach out to one another, and the past turns out to be about as difficult as a trip down to the newsagent's - just as in a number of Peter Ackroyd's other yarus. This is mostly, I suppose, because he has some firm convictions about the circularity of time and the possibility of an ongoing relationship with the past. But, at times, it does feel as if what drives his fiction is not so much conviction as convention, when he seems to be stuck inside a genre just as firmly as Barbara Cartland or Agatha Christie. It's just that his genre - the time-bending, mystical, London novel - is a little more unusual.

In this case, the plot revolves around a house in Clerkenwell that was once the property of the Elizabethan magus John Dee, and in our own time has passed to young Marthew Palmer. As the story progresses, it emerges that Matthew is a foundling, and that his late father believed him to be a magical homunculus created by Dee and fated to die and he reborn every 30 years. Over the centuries, the homunculus has been instrumental in, among other things, nurturing the careers of Isaac Newton and Charles Babbage, as well as working on radar during the Second World War. Meanwhile, back in the past, Dr Dee discovers his friend and fellow magician. Kelly, to be a fraud and a traitor. Matthew concludes he is not a homunculus; and he and Dee speak to one another across time. declaring the hope that, through "vision and imagination", they can dissolve the illusion of the reality of time, and London will become "the mystical city universal".

A nakedly silly story, in Alan Drury's dramatisation veiled with wisps of meaning. If Claire Grove's production had punctured the pomposity, offered some faint sense of irony, it would have been easier to respect it; as it was, she took it all with a very straight face, which probably made it more enjoyable. In fact, it was huge fun; but for all the wrong reasons.

Still, even when Ackroyd plays fast and loose with time and histury, he writes with the understanding that they are problematic. The Cuban Crisis (Radio 2, Tuesday) - marking the 35th anniversary of the US blockade of Cuba - was one of those frustrating programmes which seems to think that a sense of period can be faked up with a bit of old newsreel, vox pops and a couple of hit records. The narrative was streamlined enough, but a recital of events was insufficient to conjure up the atmosphere of apocalyptic paranoia that the script seemed to aim for. A wider view might have helped; as it was, the listener was left with a sense of impending ouclear catastrophe as something quaint and provincial that our parents experienced in the early Sixties.

A profounder understanding of the difficulties of untangling the past lay behind What Are They Looking At? (Radio 3, Sunday). Piers Plowright's feature, one of his last before he retires from the BBC, was gentie, thoughtful and playful - an examination of the many things that Jan Van Eyck's The Arnolfini Marriage might mean. The picture's many ambiguities (most famously; is she pregnant?) were presented from the point of view of experts and members of the public, with interpolations from the painter himself.

The tone was perpetually questioning. even good-naturedly badgering, until the very end when, disappointingly, it settled on an answer: that what the picture shows, unambiguously, is the traces of its own making, both the circumstances in which it was painted and the character of the artist. An answer that's no answer, it would have been hetter to leave the question hanging.

Better to be a boxer than to be bullied to death

When we heard that 13-year-old Emma Brammer planned to pull on big gloves and risk her beauty in the ring, the public condemned her. But the death of Kelly Yeomans, a teenager taunted into taking an overdose this week, demonstrates how important it is for young girls to feel strong and confident. Jojo Moyes reports on the making of two victims.

"When they smash gloved fists into each other's heads and faces, the mainly male audience will be cheering. But this is oo ordinary cootest. The two opposeots are 13 year-old schoolgirls wearing nothing but a skimpy vest and shorts."

Thus Emma Brammer's first attempt to win a flyweight title was sensationally publicised this week in ooe oewspaper. This seems a demeoted extension of equal opportunities," said Dr Bill O'Neill of the BMA. "I am totally against it," said Henry Cooper, former heavyweight champion. "Women are made for loving and oot hitting." These were some of the more restrained commeots.

Attitudes to womeo's participation in contact sports have always been ambivalent. But rarely have they raised feelings to this level. Boxing is one of the few spheres in which the specific aim is to damage one's can't manage anything physical."

opposeot. This sits uncomfortably with what we expect from a young girl. While there is a kind of beauty in the hattered face of the male boxer, a woman bearing the scars of battle is more likely to prompt thoughts of a "punchbag"; her scars are somehow uglier - and more readily associated with victimbood.

Emma didn't see it that way. She felt strong. "It's not about going into the ring to hurt your opponent. It's about style, making sure you avoid getting walloped and scoring points with technique," she said. "I wear a breast and groin shield and a protective helmet. It's not as dangerous as judo, karate and kick-boxing, and it's a hrilliant way of keeping fit." Despite reservations, ber parents were supportive. All sports, said her father, Derek, carried a risk - but boxing meant Emma could defeod herself; a view her mother shared.

Encouraging a 13-year-old girl to be assertive is oo mean feat, according to Anita Naik, an agony aunt who has just published Respect Yourself, about instilling self-esteem in teenage girls. "Girls lose their selfconfidence by the time they reach puberty, and some never regain it. Unlike boys, they disguise any triumphs they may have, but they'll always tell you all the things wrong with them. The girls that get their selfconfidence back tend to get it from whatever makes them feel stronger. Physical arguments aside, if boxing does it for her, then good for her. Banning girls basically suggests that they're fragile little things who

It is hard to make an adolescent girl feel comfortable in her own skin. Most, says Ms Naik, leave school "hating PE", where they feel painfully exposed and often ridiculed. They don't exercise again regularly until their tweodes, wheo they find it gives them physical confidence. The women I know who do contact sports are not aggressive, but they do feel good about themselves."

Compare Emma's experience with that of Kelly Yeomans, also 13. Kelly fulfilled all the things we want from a teenage girl, She was "bubbly and charming", worked hard at school, visited old people, and played tambourine in the Salvatioo Army. "Kelly was a lovely girl who would help anybody," said her mother, Julie. Kelly's problem was that she was too sweet, too nice. Last Sunday she took her own life, unable to cope with incessant bullying. They roaming around in search for victims, found Kelly. And found that she wouldn't retaliate. Kelly was bullied for precisely that reason, according to her father, Ivan. "I suppose it's because we are quiet, and turn the other cheek. But, if you turn the other cheek, they just come back and give you more," he said. "It hit Kelly badly. It tore her apart. She said, 'I'm frightened, Dad.'"

Anita Naik says that no matter how supportive they are, pareots cannot instil selfesteem in the young - their daughters "simply don't believe them". Kelly's family thought she was wonderful; they told her not to worry, that they had the law on their side. But the amorphous, intangible "law" seemed very distant to a 13-year-old bad called her "Fatty", and poured salt over who nightly had to codure taunts of of worth."

"Fatty" and "Smelly", and had butter and eggs pelted at her bedroom window.

Look at Kelly's omnipresent photograph this week, and you see a victim. You can tell she knew that, wheo you look at the serious little face and those magnified eyes, to which her attempted smile does oot carry. You wish she had been eocouraged to do something like boxing; not because she could have hit back, but because the young women who do so, say it makes them feel stroog. If Kelly had felt a little stronger, perhaps she would be here today.

For all the hype about "girl power", Ms Naik says her postbag is still filled with letters painfully lacking that ooe ingredieot, "We have to encourage these girls to see their own good points and highlight all the things they're good at," she says. "That is the only way we give them a sense

The irony, of course, is that on Thursday evening Emma Brammer announced that she was pulling out of her boxing match. She couldn't cope with the criticism that had been heaped upon her since her 270-secood fight was publicised.

Her mother, Elizabeth, said she was very upset. "The critics were saying things like boxing is not for girls', and saying I should grow op and get hack to my seoses," said Emma. "I didn't expect anything like it."

Emma hado't eveo wanted to become professional boxer - she said she wanted to be a photographer. But in the rush to condemn, oo one really listened. We took the happy, stroog, fulfilled one of these two young girls, and bullied her out of doing the thing that made her feel good about herself. And in doing so, we made sure that two girls became victims this week.

Separate tins for Japanese sardines who can't say 'no'

Groping has become such a problem on Tokyo's commuter trains that the police are pressing for women-only carriages. The scale of the nuisance contrasts oddly with Japan's otherwise low crime rate. Richard Lloyd Parry on the secretive world of the commuter pest and his victim.

Japan's trains, as any visitor to the country quickly discovers, are unique: the cleanest. most punctual and most efficient in the world. The poshest of the new bullet trains include conference rooms, nappychanging facilities and digital screens carrying the latest share prices. Between Tokyo and Osaka, after check-in times have beeo taken into account, it is quicker to travel by rail than to fly.

But at the humbler end of the transportatioo scale, commuter travel is remarkable for a very different reason: Japanese trains are home to the most highly organised, obsessive and persistent gropers in the world.

Yesterday, in Tokyo, the Metropolitan Police announced the latest initiative in an ongoing effort. Japanese railway companies are being urged to provide women-only carriages in an attempt to stamp out a nearepidemic of appressive fondling.

Tales of the chikun, or gropers, are part a of Japanese arban folklore, and most women who have commuted on busy subway lines for any length of time have their stories. Three years ago, a survey in Osaka found that nearly three-quarters of women interviewed had been groped at one time or other, many of them repeatedly. For there is more to the problem than just the opportunistic quick feel which occasionally afflicts women on crowded trains in Britain. Groping in Japan is an institution and a fetish, with a core of dedicated practitioners and an even larger crowd of armchair aficionados: The activities of the chikan take a wide range of unsavoury forms. At its most basic, they are so subtle as to be undetectable: a suspicious pressure on the legs from an unidentifiable hand in a mass of compressed commuters. But the worst kind of chikan takes advantage of the packed state of rush-hour trains for much bolder and more invasive groping. Stories are common of women alighting from a packed train to find their clothes speckled with semen, or even slashed open for better access by a surreptitiously wielded razor blade. Recently, there has been something of groping boom. Yesterday it was announced that arrests of chikan at Ueno, one of Tokyo's biggest stations, had doubled since the same period last year. Films featuring chikan heroes have become an established sub-genre of Japan's huge porn industry. In Tokyo's "image clubs" themed brothels, with mocked-up classrooms, changing rooms or oriental harems there are simulated train interiors where customers can act out their groping fantasies for £100 an hour, with prostitutes dressed as office workers.

Until recently, chikan even had their own magazine, Finger Press, which contained stills from groping videos, groping comic strips and even reviews of the best groping venues. When Finger Press closed down, after "disappointing" sales of a mere 30,000 a month, its editors were besieged by pleading phone calls from tearful "armchair" chikan.

For years, the problem was treated as a little more than an embarrassing nuisance. But this is giving way to recognition of both the scale of the problem, and its human cost. The idea of women-only compartments is just the latest in a series of antigroping initiatives taken by the Tokyo police. Permanent chikan counselling centres, staffed by female officers, have been set up in Tokyo's biggest stations and sting operations have been carried out, featuring policewomen in plain clothes. In a week-long undercover operation a team of 30officers bagged 30 chikan a day on the Saikyo Line, Tokyo's most notorious, where half of all offences are committed.

On almost every other count, Japan has one of the lowest crime rates in the world. Why should groping be epidemic in a country where as many murders occur in the space of a year as take place in America in one day? Crowded trains have something to do with it, but they are not in themselves uniquely Japanese. Perhaps the biggest reason is the failure of the victims themselves to speak out, and the reluctance of bystanders to intervene.

"Compared to other sex offences, I think that women as well as men don't have much of a notion that this is a crime," says Yumi Kakisako, a female police sergeant who works with chikan victims.

"The best thing the victims can do for themselves is to say No!""

Great scoop, Mr Morton, but the timing is a little indecent

EDITOR: ANDREW MARR. DEPUTY EDITOR: COLIN HUGHES, ADDRESS: I CANADA SQUARE. CANARY WHARE. LONDON E14 5DL TELEPHONE: 017t 293 2000 OR 0171 345 2000 FAX: 0171 293 2435 OR 0171-345 2435

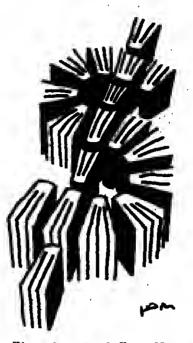

Was Andrew Morton right to have fingered his subject as the source, indeed part-author, of Diana: Her True Story? The eager buyers in the bookshops yesterday seemed glad enough to part with their money, but Mr Morton was given a roasting by the tabloid papers for "the final insult" to the People's Princess. Much of this amounted to brazen hypocrisy, condemning Mr Morton on page 1, with full details of his revelations on pages 5,6,7, 8 and 9.

But there is a serious issue of principle here. If journalists are given information in confidence, are they entitled to break that confidence if their source dies? The answer must be, unequivocally, yes. Diana's role in making her story public cannot be taken to her grave. If in five years' time a historian sought to tell the story of the modern royal family, and interviewed Mr Morton, he would have been quite wrong to continue to conceal her involvement with his book. The sense of unease arises because he has chosen to unlock his secret files barely a month after her death. But to say that Diana would have wanted her part in her public relations operation kept secret, and that her wishes should he respected, is to confuse a matter of taste with one of principle.

The law of confidence, like the law of libel, should surely not be enforceable after death. People can try to preserve family secrets after they die, but they cannot rely on it, especially if they have used a journalist to reveal them - at arm's length while they were alive, as part of a campaign to influence public opinion.

Mr Morton would have been wise to resist pressure from his publishers for a few months, because people in their present mood of reverence for Diana are properly and understandably offended. He could certainly have afforded to hold off his book has already made him rich.

There is something unseemly, too, in his selling the tapes of Diana's interviewsby-proxy which she recorded for his book. Splashing them across an American gossip-sheet is no way to show respect to the recently departed. The timing and method of publication are indecent; but publishing them at some time, in some way, would not have been wrong. On the contrary, it would be quite wrong to suppress the contents of the tapes, in the long run. Diana's estate may well be entitled to argue in law about where the proceeds from the sale of her words should go, but it should not be allowed to prevent their publication.

We see the personal effects of famous or public figures sold to the highest bidder all the time. Was it wrong to sell John Lennon's letter to his first wife, an intensely private correspondence which touches on the sensibilities of the living, namely their son Julian? The publication of personal letters and recollections of countless literary figures has caused distress to people who are still alive.

Measured against these examples, the capacity of Mr Morton's revelations to hurt those who were close to Diana is muted. We already knew that she had effectively authorised the book. Mr Morton has merely demonstrated that her approval went a lot further than being merely tacit: it was utterly complicit. But the fact that she was involved in some way was made plain by the Princess herself when the book was published, and the certainty that it was indeed her true story grew as time passed.

The new element introduced by the publishers is the addition "In Her Own Words" to the cover of the new edition. We have discovered that much of the book was effectively dictated by her, and that the proofs were corrected in her handwriting. This is of significant historical in-terest. It is not merely part of the soap opera of the royal family, it is part of the history of this country's rapidly-changing constitution. As keeper of a personal secret, Mr Morton should have waited for a proper interval. But he is in possession of history, which we have a right to know. Indeed, the revelations confirm Mr

Morton as an outstanding journalist. He scores no marks for humility, claiming yesterday that his was the "scoop of the century". Like many good journalists, he can be lambasted for a certain arrogance, as well as patent insensitivity. But he deserves our admiration for having dug out a great story and told it well. No Kitty Kelley he. He did not rush to print secondhand rumour in place uf primary sources. He did not traipse around people who had once shaken hands with the protagonists re-telling what "some say" and "others speculate". He got the story copper-bottomed, and we can now see quite how, thoroughly it was nailed into place; we can also see why, after enduring a blizzard of establishment rubbishing (the fate of many excellent and accurate scoops) his book has stood the test of time. So much of the story was so extraordinary at the time that il was easy to disbelieve it. But it was true, and now we know just how true. So, this week's revelations mark Mr Morton's ultimate vindication as a story-getter. If only they had come next year. History could have waited a while.

Corporate killers

Sir: You report (2 October) on proposals to introduce a new offence of corporate killing.

Until a few years ago serious railway accidents were followed within a few days by an internal inquiry and within a few weeks hy a public inquiry taken by an inspecting officer of railways. There were no lawyers present, witnesses were invariably open and the whole process was focused on finding the cause and recommending any necessary improvements. Prosecutions

The process has changed ont of all recognition. The police seek to prosecute, enscapegoats. Once a prosecution is under way the investigative process is delayed and complicated by witnesses seeking to defend themselves or their employers from legal retribution. Meanwhile the daily death toll on the roads exceeds that of the Southall rail crash.

A rail crash at Watford on 8 August 1996 will not come hefore the courts until April 1998. Until the criminal processes are completed the public debate about causes and remedies cannot take place. Under previous procedures inquiries would have been completed and any recommendations could be in course of implementation. The defensive culture surrounding railway accidents serves as a platform for politicians and provides an income for lawyers. ft does nothing to illuminate the causes or speed the implementation of remedial action.

Professor W P BRADSHAW Senior Visiting Research Fellow Centre for Socio-Legal

Sir: The introduction of a new offence of "corporate killing" in response to industrial disasters would remove part of the responsibility of the individual for acting safely and with excellence. Each individual would be protected by their corporate umhrella.

instead of encouraging company directors to scrutinise the actions of each employee lest their mistakes lead to that director heing held responsihie, we should be encouraging greater empowerment of the individual to for example, stop the entire production line if a quality defect is suspected. Instead of making the corporate collective responsible for the individual employee, we should be trying to increase individual accountability. SIMON BUCKINGHAM Newbury, Berkshire

MI5 to tell all?

Sir: Further to my previous letter on MI5's historical files (10 September), the plot thickens. When I recently asked the Public Record Office's Reader Services Department to comment on rumours of an imminent release of MI5 files they denied all knowledge. Others have apparently been told by Reader Services that MI5 material from the First World War is to he released "in the near future" but that no further information is available.

I have gleaned more details by talking (off the record) to a PRO official in another department. I understand that MI5's in-house history covering couraged by the media seeking the First World War, some fifty volumes, will be released into the PRO in mid-November and that a BBC Timewatch documentary based un this is being prepared. Next year we can expect to see M15 material from the Second World War and then from the inter-war pe-

Single parents

Sir: As a long-time single parent, it is with both fear and anger that I read of recommendations by this or that 'think-tank" to "get tough on single mothers" and prevent us from "slipping into a dependency mentality" (report 29 September).

Do people not understand that life for single parents is already tough and that a mother, ur, indeed any parent or guardian "with care", is already doing a joh? We are no more "dependent" on society than any other worker. We often cannot manage a second job.

Who are the people who make such recommendations? None of them, I helieve, a mother who has had to survive for years un end on the hreadline hecause the day nurseries have closed down, the co-parent takes little or no responsibility and the available work is so badly paid the money will not stretch to pay for the rent, the food, the clothes and the child-

Imagine for a moment that you are Mrs Kylie Kerr of Newton Abbott in the county of Devon. It is a summer's morning, and among your day's chores is that of picking up the laundry from the dry-cleaners. There are, maybe, a hlouse or two, possibly a skirt, and a suit belonging to your 41year-old husband, Don. You hand your little green ticket over the counter, and the shop assistant goes off and rattles hangers somewhere in the back. A minute passes, and she returns with the clothes - and with something else; two gold ear-rings with coloured edges, found (she tells you) in Don's trousers pocket. They are not yours.

Now it's time to change sex and become Don himself. In the warm evening of the same day, you arrive home from the music shop that you run, and immediately sense a certain domestic froideur. The dog is quiet, the cat subdued, the radio is tuned to your least favourite station. All is explained when your wife Kylie produces - from behind her back - a strange pair of ear-rings, and holds them accusingly out to you, in the palm of one hand. These, she informs you, were found in your trousers. And you are lost for words, for you have never, ever seen them before.

Let us step outside Don, and contemplate his plight from the comfort of our own bodies. He is guiltless. It is unlikely that he has had an absent-minded affair with a woman and then pocketed her ear-rings, all without noticing. But his protestations of innocence sound no different to those of the guilty man lying. Can he prove that he hasn't been having it off with a doxy?

You can see the difficulty. There are only two ways that he can empirically convince the world that he is guiltless (yes, the world, for though Kylie accepts his innocence. Newton Abbott is abuzz with the story). The first is to show that it is impossible for him to have committed the crime. The second is for the owner of the earrings to come forward and claim them. Both are tall orders. How can you, after all, prove a negative? There is nobody for you to say that you were never with, for nobody exists. And nobody may ever admit that the ear-rings were theirs - or even know that they were lost. It is everybody's

In Don's case, the nightmare has been shortlived. The dry-cleaners have admitted that they made an error, and the unfortunate husband has been absolved. But he might just as easily have fallen victim to an obstinate refusal to admit a mistake. And then what would he have done?

Don may be this week's story, but twice in the past month respected periodicals have printed articles suggesting that there are ways - short of discovery en flagrante to tell if your spouse is betraying the marital bed. Or, indeed, is likely to.

The first, which appeared in a number of august journals - including the Daily Mail - detailed the work of Dr David Buss, an American sociologist who interviewed 107 couples together and separately. He correlated their answers with the incidence of adultery, and concluded that there was n personality profile of the adulterer. Based on this profile (it was claimed), one should be able to discern from other behaviour whether one's partner was likely to stray.

In fact, one might be able to tell simply from going out to dinner. For signs would include arriving late, looking in the ball mirror, interrupting others, going to the loo and leaving the door open, and - most revealing of all - driving past squashed animals and laughing callously.

Clearly, such information is doubleedged. Should another man find himself in Don's position, he might be saved from suspicion because he exhibited none of these tendencies. Were be punctual, taciturn, discreet and - when driving - sentimental, he would clearly fail to meet the personality profile.

So far, so good. But suppose that you were entirely innocent of wrongdoing, yet one dark night - giggled at a joke that you'd heard some hours before, just as you passed a flattened badger? Your wife or husband (an avid Mail reader) slams on the brakes, screeches to a halt, turns to you and saarls, "Who is it? I know you're having an affair!" Very nasty. But not, I'm afraid, as bad as it can get.

This newspaper itself revealed last month that - I quote - "it is a matter of scientific fact that promiscuous men have larger testicles". This is (let me add hastily) a cause, not an effect. Anyway, 80 Manchester University students - my own alma mater - allowed a zoologist, Dr Robin Baker, to measure the volume of their gonads, using a pair of calipers (warm, I hope; in my day student grants were large enough to spare us the necessity of submitting ourselves to such examinations).

Baker's largest gonad was 52 cubic cen timetres, the smallest just 8 - and the average 24. Then he set testicle size against sexual behaviour and discovered a clear correlation: the chaps with higger halls were more likely to use them. It isn't clear why. I suppose it may be because larger genitals are more obtrusive, and thus assert themselves over the personality of the owner. Or perhaps the the greater amount of sperm-making activity somehow impels the testicle-owner into primeval, instinctual sperm-losing frenzies. Whatever. My point in all this is not to explain the theory, but to share a concern. It is, after all, possible for a man to shun drycleaners and thus never find himself baving to explain errant ear-rings. He can also avoid mirrors, never interrupt party guests, and force himself to weep over squashed hedgehogs. But what, oh gentle reader, is a chap to do if his testicles are too big?

Be a sport: Peter Sutherland, chairman of Goldman Sachs, puts his all into a charity project with south London schoolchildren this week

A sporting chance for volunteers

If you're at a loose end this weekend there is plenty of work to do. The problem is, you won't get paid for it. Week by week, 23 million Britons turn out to do voluntary work or raise funds for charities, to help at vouth clubs and old people's homes, to sit on public bodies, to comfort the sick and dying, That's more people than are in paid employment; and though, for many, it is rewarding in itself, the work offers little by way of recompense.

This is Giving Britain at its best. However, the announcement that the chairman of the Arts Council will stand down next year to spend more time with his business partners has raised a crucial question: should the boss of an outfit that. shells out some half a billion pounds of public money each. year be paid to do the job properly?

of all that is good about public service in Britain: urbane, intelligent, cultivated, community minded and decent. As a recent recruit to the Arts Council, I can vouch for the huge amount of time that he and its other members spend on the arts business. Yet he, like many others in his position, does the job without pay, and seemingly without strain; despite his Irish peerage, he almost defines the 19th-century English expression "languid". When first coined, this was not meant at the time to suggest laziness or indolence, but that a person was talented enough to perform well without apparent effort. The same might have been said about David Gower's batting or Muhammad Ali's boxing.

Yet even Gowrie, for all his talents, apparently has to make a living. For most of the 23 million who give their time for free, there is a cost. It may be in time spent away from work or family; it almost certainly involves taking care of money donated directly by the public or the Treasury. And here is the difference to the old days of oldstyle philanthropy. There is hig money involved here.

Charities represent some 3 per cent of our GDP; they employ some 450,000 people. fully 2 per cent of the national workforce. They are part of our national fabric, and, along with the mushrooming growth of quangos, have provided an outlet for the British mania for dogooding of all kinds. This is not new, it stretches back through the centuries. But in the past it has been possible to characterise this kind of voluntary activity as faintly fidicition and irrelevant - even a bit

In Bleak House, Dickens' Mrs Jellyby, a "rapacious benevolent", could have landed yon picking coffee beans on the hanks of the Niger at Borrioboola-Gha if you weren't careful. But as well as fear, such people inspire cynicism. Mrs Jellyby was "a lady of remarkable strength of character who devotes herself entirely to the public. She has devoted herself to an extensive variety of public subjects at various times and is at present devoted to the subiect of Africa - until something else attracts her ..."

However, the massive growth of the so-called "third sector" - the others being the public and private sector - has made all such sneering seem irrelevant. Vast areas of public expenditure are in the hands of gifted (and not-so-gifted) amateurs. The appointments to NHS Trusts are a case in point. The dispensation of billions of bounds of faxpayers cash, the employment of hundreds of thousands of people and the health of the nation rest in the hands of a few hundred non-professionals. Even more spectacularly, the tens of hillions raised by the Lottery will, in theory, be in the hands of the voluntary bodies that run the Sports Council, Arts Council and so forth; by my reckoning over the next three or four years each quango member will give away an average of nearly £100m.

TREVOR

PHILLIPS THE THIRD SECTOR'

Do we really want to give this kind of power to Mrs Jellyby? Actually, yes; the great virtue of this way of working is that it disperses power away from the iron grip of national government, and potentially weakens the baleful influence of party politics on these great areas of policy. And not all those who currently give their time are Mrs Jellybys many that I've worked with are talented individuals with a conscience and time to spare. Yet, typically, those who run quangos and big charities are male, white, and elderly. Where they are not, it is because they are independently wealthy, or women with husbands able to free them from the need to work,

Being the chairman of a quango, The London Arts Board, currently trying to find suitable new members. I can say how hard it is to find people who don't just feel like "more of the same". Few of us in the midst of careers have the opportunity to serve, however much we would like to; still fewer who are not well-off can even consider giving the time. Even those of us with decent jobs can expect a raised eyebrow from hard-pressed colleagues when we leave early to affend a meeting that is nothing to with the business. The range of public services provided by the third sector is now too great either to privatise or nationalise; so how do we make it work?

Some companies, recognising that the experience of belping to run a voluntary organisation adds to the ability of their employees take a relaxed attitude to time spent in such activities; a few even... encourage it. But sooner or later someone is going to make a bard choice.

How ministers are mastering Sir Humphrey

BEVINS LABOUR AND WHITEHALL

Cabinet ministers in Brighton for this week's Labour Party conference have revealed ways in which they are snapping the bonds that civil servants have tried to impose on them.

One minister told The Independent that he had asked for a meeting to be arranged to take a particular decision, at which he wanted a couple of other ministers, expecting that they would each have one or two officials in attendance. Instead, he arrived at the meeting to be confronted by between 30 and 35 officials. "It was like a Labour conference fringe meeting," he said scomfully. A further, smaller meeting was quickly reached.

The same man noted that not all Cabinet colleagues were so decisive. "Some review, some decide." he said in a contemptuous reference to the way in which some ministers handled their arrival in departments by launching reviews rather than getting on with the

Other ministers have been marked down as people who stick rigidly to their departmental briefs, the notes written by civil servants that are supposed to guide them through inter-departmental negotiations in Cabinet committee. The crib-sheets tell ministers that they must not disclose their hand to colleagues, particularly the Treasury.

But Labour ministers have been cutting through the culture of Whitehall secrecy by passing on their departmental notes to their colleagues, enabling more informed decisions to be made - though not always in their own narrow departmental interest.

One reason for this goverument culture-change is that ministers have become accustomed in Opposition to a very different way of working. They are operating an alternative Labour network, a tight-knit that their officials have been called and a decision was circle of friends who trust each other, who work behind the backs of hidebound officials and brief-bound colleagues.

> Critics see overtones of Margaret Thatcher's "one of us" culture being repeated, and a politicisation of the Civil-Service being pursued, as similar networks of "New Whitehall" officials are identified across departments, with Labour ministers recruiting co-operative civil servants to

They argue that, Labour having been elected by a landslide, officials are there to help carry out the party's programme. If they get in the way,

That process has already started, with the departure of a number of senior figures from some departments. Alastair Campbell, the Prime Minister's press secretary, is also

But he adds: "One has to remember, at the risk of sounding like a Permanent Secretary, that the Civil Service has this great power to sit it out and then to return, like an automatic pilot, to a slightly changed version of the status demanding a "raised game" from the Government Information Service, the Civil Service press officers.

A number of ministers describe the weekly meetings of Cahinet as perfunctory and mundane. The real business of government is being carried out in key cahinet committees where men such as Lord Irvine of Lairg, the Lord Chancellor, push through fast-track decisions.

The Civil Service machine

might normally offer the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer one formal diary meeting a week. In practice, Gordon Brown and Tony Blair, who have lived cheek by jowl for many years, frequently hold meetings in the early morning and late evening without officials present - which means no minutes can be taken and the Civil Service is bypassed.

Last week, there were no civil servants present when Jack Cunningham, Minister for Agriculture, and Frank Dohson, Secretary of State for Health, agreed that they should ask the Prime Minister to set up a judicial inquiry to track down those to blame for the introduction of BSE into cattle and the human food chain.

Other ministers, such as John Prescott, the Deputy Prime Minister, have been known openly to repudiate the advice given to them by their most senior officials. Mr Prescott was told that he must not visit the scene of the recent Southall rail crash. He went.

But that does not mean that civil servants are being regarded with general disdain. When Gordon Brown arrived in the Treasury on 2 May he pulled out of his pocket a three-page document and handed it to Sir Terence Burns, his Permanent Secretary, giving him Labour's plans for Bank of England independence on interest rates. It took a team of leading officials just days - in some cases without sleep - to implement the rush plan, with all the secrecy that was required.

In his speech to the Labour conference on Tuesday, Tony Blair gently chided officials with an indirect warning about their behaviour. "They're not in the habit of calling anything a good idea," he told delegates, which given the last 18 years is hardly surprising.

"When they describe a proposal as 'amhitious', or, even worse, 'interesting', what they really mean is they think it was a stupid idea, dreamt up at the last minute for the manifesto.

"When they describe it as 'challenging', they mean there's not a hope in hell of making it work. And when they say of a policy that 'it really is quite a brave proposal, Prime Minister', it means they've got the doctor outside waiting to sign the certificates ...

It was said afterwards that Mr Blair had been short of a joke or two for his speech. But the writing was also being scrawled on the wall for the officials back in Whitehall:

Archbishop Volodymyr Sterniuk

born Pustomyty, Austro-Hungarian Empire 12 February 1907; ordained priest 1931; consecrated 1964 Bishop of Peremysl; Archbishop of Lviv locum tenens 1969-91; died Lviv, Ukraine 29 September 1997.

Archhishop Volodymyr Sternjuk of Lviv was for 22 years the head of the banned Ukrainian Catholic Church in its home territory of western Ukraine. During the church's persecution his life consisted of, as he later described it, "surveillance, bouse searches and interrogations on the part of the state and, on my side, attempts to evade surveillance so as at least to be able to carry out ordinations".

Sterniuk was born in 1907 in the village of Pustomyty near Lviv, then part of the Austro-Hungarian empire, War soon engulfed the area and Russian troops of the Tsarist army invaded. Then fighting broke out between Ukrainians and Poles and he was taken with his family to safety in Lviv. Sterniuk decided to follow his father into the priesthood. He was sent by the Redemptorist Order to Belgium to complete his schooling, in 1927 joining their novitiate in St Trond. He studied theology in Louvain and was ordained priest in Belgium in 1931.

Sterniuk returned to western Ukraine and was sent to Volhynia to do missionary work. These were difficult years for Eastern-rite Catholics under Polish rule. The government and Roman Catholic Church were keen to assimilate them into the Polish community and church. The missionary work ran into problems when it was put under Polish church control.

In 1939 the Red Army invaded Ivano-Frankivsk, where Sterniuk was living. But before the Soviets could establish themselves the Nazis arrived. They immediately started rounding up and murdering the local Jewish population. Many Jews came to ask Sterniuk for a cerlificate of baptism, which he gave with no questions. The SS. suspicious about the number he had issued, twice came to arrest him. He had to flee the area, taking refuge in Lviv, where the great prestige of Metropolitan Andrei Sheptytsky, the powerful inter-war leader of the Ukrainian Catholic Church. somewhal restrained the Germans' attacks.

But the Soviets soon returned, and Stalin moved to extinguish the Ukrainian Catholic Church. A forced "synod" in Lviv in 1946, held after the arrest of many leading figures in the church, voted to "re-unite" with the Russiao Orthodox Church, Sterniuk, who opposed the forced merger, was arrested in June 1947 for illegally carrying on with his priestly work. He was sentenced to five years in labour camp, which he served in the Arkhangelsk region. On release Sterniuk re-various jobs before qualifying as a medical assistant in 1959. In July 1964 he was secretly consecrated as bishop of Peremysl (a diocese which crossed the new Polish/Ukrainian border) by Archbishop Vasyl Velychkovsky. This was the time when secret consecrations, without the prior knowledge or approval of the Vatican, were required to continue the apostolic succession of the church.

Sterniuk was to be Velychkovsky's successor in case of his arrest - which indeed happened in January 1969. Although he had been consecrated bishop of Peremysl, Velychkovsky told him he had jurisdiction over the whole of the Galician Metropolia, based on Lviv. His position as leading Galician hishop was confirmed when Sterniuk heard in February 1972 by a roundabout route that the Vatican had confirmed him as locum tenens of the Archdiocese of Lviv. By this time Sterniuk was retired, so he had time to devote to his secrel episcopal duties. Although the Soviet authorities knew well he was a hishop, Sterniuk appeared in public only as a priest. It was in private at priestly ordinations and the consecration of bishops - often only in the company of the required two witnesses - that he wore episcopal garments.

Sterniuk believed his main duty during those years was lo protect the church's structure and to lead the clergy. He took a back seat to the more activist clergy who ministered directly to the faithful and who led the increasingly vocal campaigns for the church's relegalisation. It was only with the arrival of glasnost in the late 1980s that realistic hopes were raised that the Soviet authorities would at last admit that the 1946 "synod" was bogus and the church could be relegalised. As the Russian Orthodox Church gathered its forces to resist this move, Archbishop Sterniuk's status as leading hierarch in Ukraine came to be publicly admitted. This was confirmed in September 1987, when the Ukrainian Calholic synod in Rome (made up only of hishops from the emigration) declared that there were 10 hishops in Ukraine, headed by Archhishop Sterniuk. Many visitors from inside Ukraine and abroad were already making the trek to the dingy one-room turned to Lviv. He worked at flat in Lviv where he had lived since 1957.

The momentum for relegalisation was kept up in 1988 and 1989, with hunger strikes in Moscow and demonstrations. On 15 August 1989 all the church's 10 hishops crowded into Sterniuk's flat for their first ever meeting, many not even knowing the identity of all the other hishops. Events moved fast and, to coincide with the historic first meeting of Pope John Paul II and Mikhail Gorbachev in the Vatican on 1 December 1989, it was announced that the ban on the church had been lifted.

The Novosti news agency interviewed Sterniuk on what he described as "this joyful day". It was on 7 January 1990 (Christmas Day in the Eastern Church) that Archbishop Sterniuk first appeared in public as a bishop, when he celebrated a triumphal Christmas liturgy in Lviv.

On 16 January 1991 the Vatican confirmed all the 10 secret bishops in office - but Sterniuk was pointedly described as "Archbishop", not "Metropolitan" as he had customarily been described in Ukraine. The division between the Church in the West, headed directly by Cardinal Myroslav Lubachivsky from Rome, and the Church on its home territory of western Ukraine was one that needed delicate bandling.

Sterniuk's moral authority in western Ukraine was great, and Cardinal Lubachivsky, especially on his return to Lviv on 30 March 1991 after more than 50 years' exile from Ukraine, had to tread carefully to assert his leadership. Sterniuk had already been rebuked by the church for accepting into communion with Rome Bishop Vikenty of the True Orthodox Church, a breakaway group from the Russian Orthodox Church which had existed in the catacombs.

Surviving long enough to see the church's relegalisation, it was hard for Sterniuk to accept that he was then only second in command to Cardinal Lubachivsky, who had not shared the sufferings of the church directly. Already 82 at the time of relegalisation, Sterniuk could leave the many problems of the church - the shortage of priests and facilities, disputes with the Russian and Ukrainian Orthodox Churches - to the younger generation, which by now was coming to the fore. Coming from the older generation, who had studied in Western Europe between the wars, Sterniuk had a wider view of the world than those who had grown up under Soviet rule. He once apologised to a Western visitor that so few of the younger clergy could converse in Latin. His hospitality, keen intellect and sense of humour endeared him to visitors. but it was his steadfast dedication to his office and his sufferings that gave him a place of honour in western Ukraine.

Christopher van Kampen

Christopher van Kampen, cellist: born Pinner, Middlesex 4 September 1945: married Marcia Crayford (one son, one daughter; marriage dissolved); died Pinner 30 September 1997.

Kampen was a gifted and versatile soloist and chamber music player who was equally at home with the music of Haydn and Mozart as that of the most avant-garde composers of the present time.

Van Kampen read Mathematics at King's College, Cambridge, and studied the cello with Douglas Cameron at the Royal Academy of Music in London, where in his first year he became a finalist in the BBC Cello Competition. In 1967 he hecame the cellist of the Nash Ensemble, with whom he continued to perform worldwide right up to his death. In 1969, at the age of 24, he was appointed Principal Cellist of the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra, a position he held for three years.

In 1968 van Kampen had played in the inaugural concert of the London Sinfonietta and in the early 1970s became Principal Cellist. Over the years be appeared as a soluist with most of the leading British orchestras and played in a number of chamber music ensembles, including the Brindisi String

He specialised in contem-

with and performed under many celebrated composers including Luciano Berio, Hans Werner Henze and Sir Michael Tippett. In 1988 he gave the first performance of Hans Abraham's Lied in Fall, a work written especially for him, and in 1990 gave the UK premiere of H.K. Gruher's Cello Concerto. which he also played in the 1991 Proms. He was closely associated with John Tavener's The Protecting Veil for cello and orchestra, which he played many times in the UK and ahroad, including the 1992 Aldehurgh Festival with the London Sinfonietta. He performed Benjamin Britten's complete works for the solo cello at the Wigmore Hall and once played both Shostakovich's cello concertos at the same concert at St John's Smith Square. His numerous solo recordings included music from Janacek, Hindemith and Debussy to Schubert, and he also made many recordings with the Nash Ensemble where again the music ranged from Debussy and Ravel to Beethoven, Brahms and Dyorak.

He was absolutely devoid of any professional jealousy and working with him was sheer pleasurc."

The concert given by the Nash Ensemble on 5 October as part of the South Bank's Raising Sparks Festival will be dedicated to his memory. On 13 October, with the viola player Paul Silverthorne and the London Sinfonietta under Martyn Brabbins, he was due to give the world premiere of Alexander Raskatov's double concerto Miserere in memoriam Oleg Kagan, as part of the Dimensions Festival at the South Bank; this concert will now also be dedicated to his memory.

Dorothy Kingsley

Dorothy Kingsley, screenwriter: born New York 14 October 1989; twice married (three sons, three daughters); died Carmei, California 26 September

"I never think of myself as a real writer," said Dorothy Kingsley, looking back on a long career. "I only wrote because I needed the money." The money was steady, and came principally from MGM, who employed this prolific, witty writer for 16 husy years on such musicals as Seven Brides for Seven Brothers, Kiss Me, Kate, and no less than seven vehicles for the swimming star Esther Williams. Born in New York to an actress mother and a journalist father, Kingsley moved with her mother to Detroit after her parents divorced. After her own marriage was dissolved in the late 1930s, she took her three sons to Los Angeles, determined to support them by becoming a gag writer. She wrote radio comedy for Bob Hope and, later, for the ventriloquist Edgar Bergen, who started her in screenwriting when he and his dummy Charlie McCarthy appeared in RKO's Look Who's Laughing (1941). This lowhudget second feature was a surprise smash hit, and Kingsley also contributed material to its successful sequel, Here We Go, Again (1942).

She then started writing original screen stories and submitting them to the studios. MGM's legendary producer Arthur Freed was impressed with her work and bad her placed under contract - her first assignment, to write additional dialogue for the Mickey Rooney/Judy Garland musical Girl Crazy (1943). She was also asked to bring some order to the chaotic screenplay of Bathing Beauty (1944), a Red Skelton-Esther Williams musical, on which six other writers had already laboured. The result of her endeavours was a lop-grossing film that made Williams one of the studio's biggest stars. Her fourth script for the "Chlorine Queen" was Nep-His fellow musicians ap- tune's Daughter (1949). Frank composed a surefire duet, but didn't know what to do with it. After hearing the song, she wrote a new scene, in which Williams and Ricardo Montalban could sing it. The number, "Baby, It's Cold Outside", won the 1949 Best Song Oscar.

> After writing the screen version of Sam and Bella Spewack

and Cole Porter's Kiss Me, Kate (1953), Kingsley was asked to refine Frances Goodrich and Albert Hackett's script for Seven Brides for Seven Brothers (1954). Deciding that Adam Pontipee (Howard Keel) had too much to do and his wife Milly (Jane Powell) too little, she wrote a scene in which Milly taught Adam's brothers how to woo a female. She then got Johnny Mercer and Gene de Paul to write "Goin' Co'tin' ", one of the film's most winning song-and-dance numbers. Reviewing the film version of Rodgers and Hart's musical Pal Joey (1957), Time magazine stated, "Almost everything that could be done wrong the moviemakers have done wrong in this production, and yet somehow the picture comes out remarkably right." Columbia Pictures had indeed cut oul most of the Broadway show's songs while bowdlerising the remaining ones, and Kingsley's script had changed the lecherous Vera Simpson (Rita Hayworth) from an adulterous wife to a widow, disinfected John O'Hara's original dialogue, and allowed the reptilian Joey Evans to give up his womanising ways by the final scene. Yet, the film was still far sexier and sharper than most screen musicals, studded with classic Rodgers and Hart songs from other sources, and blessed with the perfect Joey in Frank Sinatra, So pleased was Ol' Blue Eyes with Kingsley's contribution to Pal Joey that he later accepted, sight unseen, the screen version of Cole Porter's Can-Can (1960), which she co-

In 1967 Kingsley and Helen Deutsch co-wrote the profitable film version of Jacqueline Susann's Valley of the Dolls. Clearly, the experience gave Kingsley a taste for soap opera; in 1969 she created and wrote Bracken's World, an hour-long television series set in the mythical Century Studios. Variety called it "the classiest soap yet. The setting is the entire 20th Century-Fox Iol." Perhaps Bracken's World was too classy for the general public; it lasted only two seasons. After its cancellation, Dorothy Kingsley retired from writing and concentrated on her social activi ties, her children and her second marriage, to William Durney, owner of a scafood company and a winery.

For 27 years her name was absent from film credits, until 1994, when the Disney corporation remade Angels in the Outfield, her 1951 comedy-fantasy about an eight-year-old orphan girl (Donna Corcoran) whose prayers turn a losing baseball team into a world-beating one. Despite some abusive reviews, the remake was a smash hit -Kingsley's last.

When Pat McGilligan interviewed her eight years ago for Backstory 2, his book on screenwriters, he asked which of her films she preferred. After singling out Pal Joev and Angels in the Outfield, she said, "The others, I always think, 'Gee, wby didn't we do this?' or 'it should have been better ...'

FAITH & REASON

The geometry of innocent flesh on the bone

Bob Dylan's songs to God are among the finest Christian hymns ever written. Rooted in an apocalyptic Calvinism Dylan sings like a man with the Last Things right before his eyes, writes Andrew Brown.

When Boh Dylan sang for the Pope a week ago today, it did not seem a meeting of equals: one of the two men can draw huge crowds of young people wherever he goes and still releases bestselling alhums of dense poetry; the other is widely seen as the clapped-out old relic of an outmoded belief system even though he is only 56 and has just released a very good record himself.

But 1 still like to believe that Dylan will be remembered as long as the Pope. at least by those who care about religious poetry. For the songs he wrote in his Christian period in the early Eighties seem to me as fine as any hymns l know. Of course they're not George Herbert or even John Bunyan. They derive a great part of their power from the music - but that is not a crime in hymnody; and they are infinitely better than happy-clappy drivel like "Shine, Jesus, Shine", named in a moment of regrettable spontaneity by George Carey as one of his favourite hymns.

Unless you visit the churches where they are perpetrated, it is difficult to grasp just how bad the "worship song" can be. Not even Dylan at his most bathetic can match such things as "Lord, you put a tongue in my mouth" or "Lord, I can feel you changing me" the nappy song. And Dylan's songs to God are not his most hathetic. For one thing, they are not mushy. Whether as a Jew or a Christian, he has always been apocalyptically interested: one of the songs he performed for the Pope was "A Hard Rain's Gonna Fall", written for the Cuhan Missile Crisis in 1962, when it seemed the world might be blown up nuclear: it is a descent into the valley of the shadow of death, all right, but the route taken is nowhere specified. As a Christian, however, he was a Calvinist. He studied under John Wimber, once the drummer in the Righteous Brothers, who founded one of the groupings of the last 30 years. Wimber's exception: a piece of secondary dogma, Vineyard Fellowship has specialised in miracles and apocalyptic excitements. First it was healings, then prophecies, and most recently the Toronto Blessing; yet all these have been anchored in a rigorous Calvinism.

There are so many things wrong with a system that holds that a just God will condemn millions to eternal, unimaginable suffering, that it is easy to overlook the merits of Calvinism, and chief this last known for obvious reasons as among these is beauty. It is a heautiful system of thought in the way that engincering, chess, or even software can be beautiful: all the vast forces within are perfectly arranged and balanced. It hrings to life Dylan's phrase about the geometry of innocent flesh on the bone". God's justice and his mercy between them account for all the varieues of human experience; and if most of at any moment. But its imagery is not these varieties turn out to be unpleasant, that conforms the close fit of the theory to experience. Everything exists within a perfect finished plan. Dylan has always thrown fragments of religious texts into his songs, but they usually come from the Bible, "Perfect finished plan", which comes in the chomost successful fundamentalist church tus of "Every Grain of Sand" is a rare which he manages, however, to integrate completely into the argument and passion of the song. It is only crahbed old religious freaks who notice it in the hoarse torrent of conviction with which he sings. For the real triumph of Dylan as a religious singer is the way that he manages to inject fierce personal anguish into the cold certainties of Calvinism. Dylan can sing like a man with the Last Things right before his eyes.

Some form of this is traditional among rock stars: many have sung as if the last overdose were in front of them. But just as Dylan sings about deeper hells than that, he also sings wonderfully of joy. I don't think anything written this century can beat the leaping, bounding joy of "You Shall Be Changed" with its chorus in which the dead arise - and hurst out of their clothes. Bursting is the verb to make the resurrection of the body mean something. And while other journalists may pacify their children on long car journeys with tapes of Pope John Paul reciting the rosary. I will continue to inflame mine with great blasts of "Slow Train

British Land leads blue chips in another headlong charge

MARKET REPORT

DEREK PAIN STOCK MARKET REPORTER OF THE YEAR British Land, the property group created by John Ritblat, led blue chips on another headlong charge as stories swirled it could be the next to get involved in corporate action.

involved in corporate action.

One persistent suggestion is a bid for MEPC, the nation's third largest property group which looks vulnerable.

Earlier this year MEPC had merger talks with smaller rival Hammerson; then it dallied with Greycoat before nearly getting together with Burford. In between, it is thought to have had more than a passing acquaintance with BritLand.

MEPC is currectly indutging in a defensive restructuring. It is retreating from foreign parts, intendiog to hand to shareholders £300m of the proceeds from its overseas sales.

BritLand was at one time 34.5p higher at a 699.5p peak; the shares closed at 694p, a 29p gain. MEPC jumped 17p to 451p; its £247m hid for the rather uoglamorous PSIT property group has been accepted by sharcholders representing 96.17 per cent.

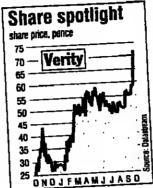

Footsie had another high octane session, ending 34.7 points higher at 5,330.8, another peak. At one time it appeared to have run out of steam but when New York opened with a rush, inspired by subdued employment figures, the bulls regained the ascendancy.

The FTSE 250 MidCap index jumped 22.6 to a 4,883.9 peak and the FTSE SmallCap index added 11.1 to 2,300.8.

Redland, the building materials group which tooked like being demolished by worse than expected interim figures, continued to recover. It is claimed chairman Rupert Agnew regards the group as vulnerable to a predatory strike. A review is aoder way which could lead to job losses. The shares rallied 21.5p to 254p; they slumped to 220p wheo the half-time results appeared.

BT remained in demand, up 10p to 469.5p io another round of heavy trading. Barelays' planned BZW deal left the shares 49.5p down at

British Blotech had the dubious distinction of becoming another drug group to disappoint, falling 15.5p to 134p after abandoning an arthritis treatment. Glaxo Wellcome

Verity jumped 15p to a 72.75p record in busy trading. It has clinched seven more licensing deals, making 11 this year, for its NXT wafer thin loudspeaker technology. Negotiations involving aoother 20 links are going on. In the year to June the company made a $7.3m loss. Last year Verity shares were down to 5.5p.

Thinstall, an electronic group, was lifted 16p to 107p on a proposed management buyout. Network Technology held at 159p. The company, developing and selling print servers, has suffered contract delays and Merrill Lynch has cut its profits forecast but suggests the shares could reach 250p in the next year. It is looking for £4.5m this year and £6.7m next.

Latchways, which develops safety equipment for builders, made a firm debut. Placed at 155p the shares closed at 174.5p.

BZW businesses for sale as Barclays gives up global ambitions

Barclays abandoned its ambition to be a global player in investment banking yesterday, putting BZW's equities and corporate finance businesses up for sale. Tom Stevenson, Financial Editor, reports on the bank's change of heart.

BZW swapped one kind of uncertainty for another vesterday after Barclays, its parent, said it was inviting offers for a large part of the investment hank. Staff, who had learned to live with persistent rumours they were on the block, are oow worrying about the ideotity of their new owner.

Bill Harrison, BZW's chief executive for little more than a year, resigned yesterday after the integrated investment bank he was expensively drafted in to run was dismembered.

Shares in Barclays tumbled after its chief executive Martin Taylor claimed he had not yet found a buyer for BZW, prompting fears that the bank's most valuable asset - its staff - might leave before a deal was finalised. Having soared over the last month by more than 20 per cent on speculation that a deal was imminent, they closed 49.5p lower yesterday at 1697.5p.

Mr Taylor said the decisioo to sell the equities and mergers and acquisitions advisory arms of BZW had been taken around two weeks ago, but staff were only informed officially at an early morning meeting at the investment bank's new headquarters in London's Docklands yesterday.

The disposal follows months of increasingly feverish speculation about the future of BZW. Mr Taylor has been under considerable pressure from investors to improve the returns from investment banking or withdraw.

Barclays said it would hold on to BZW's markets division and its debt-reequity arms, which it will group together within the bank as Barclays Capital Group. Goldman Sachs has been appointed to advise on the sale of the remainder.

Mr Taylor defended his decision to announce the intention to sell before a buyer had been secured, saying it would provide BZW's staff with "clarity". He said the initial "shock, sadness and disappointment" of staff had quickly been replaced by an understanding that the move was inevitable, given the changing nature of the equities market.

Few in the City believed that Barclays would have announced the sale without having a potential bidder in the wings. Yesterday's move was seen as a ruse to flush out other possible buyers. One analyst said Barclays' claim not to have had private discussions with buyers was "ludicrous".

Germany's Commerzhank, ING of Holland, Switzerland's UBS and Paribas of France are seen as the front-runners in the auction. One rumour circulating yesterday suggested that Barclays already had four sealed bids.

Both BZW and its rival NatWest Markets have found themselves squeezed betweeo the so-called bulge bracket of giant American investment banks, which have flourished on the back of an ecormous domestic franchise, niche UK players such as Flemings, Schroders and Close Brothers, and the cootinental banks that are pouring millions of pounds of investment into

Mr Taylor said yesterday the world of investment banking was changing rapidly from a series of national brokerages to one dominated by hig global players. He believed the investment needed to join that elite club was too large, and the returns too uncertain, to justify the risks involved.

Bill Harrison added: "The issue is the investment required to provide the primary and derivatives focus which elevates the scale and nature of the business in a very competitive market. The competition lated restructuring, lending and private gradient is steepening all the time."

Uncertain future: Following Barclays' announcement yesterday, BZW staff are worrying about the identity of their new owner be sold as relatively small in the cootext of BZW, representing about £200m of the firm's total income of nearly £700m last year. He warned that redundancies, especially in back office functions which employ 3,500 out of a worldwide total of 7,500, were inevitable.

Bill Harrison said he was leaving BZW because he had come to run an integrated business and the decision to break up the firm was not consistent with that vision. He added, however, that he understood completely the competing demands on capital that Mr Taylor faced and respected the

The decision by Barclays to throw in the towel in investment banking means this year comes close to matching the traumas of 1995 for the sector. That year saw the col-

Mr Taylor described the operations to SBC and the purchase of Kleinwort Benson and Smith New Court by Dresdner Bank and Merrill Lynch respectively.

Mr Harrison caused shockwaves at BZW when he was hired following the death of former chief executive David Band in 1996 on a package worth £6m over five years. A hlunt operator, whose Birmingham accent set him apart from the City's smoother types, he is variously described as a "human dynamo, robust and rebellious" and less favourably as "Atula the Brum".

His management style has been described as "bouncing off the walls, inspiring staff and terrorising his enemies with his own brand of raw energy". Within months of arriving at BZW last September, he replaced almost all its senior staff, spending heavily on recruitment to replace a lapse of Barings, the sale of Warburgs to steady stream of defectors who were unhappy with the new more aggressive regime. Having famously described time at home as "a wasted marketing opportunity", Mr Harrison is not expected to be out of a job for loog. Martin Taylor confirmed that he would be receiving compensation hut would not say how much.

The ecormity of the task facing Mr Harrisoo when he arrived at BZW last year was underlined within mooths of his appointment by a slump in its profits during 1996 from £289m to £204m. Barclays' shares crashed following the announcement of its results as investors focused on the drag to the group's overall return on capital from investment hanking. Martin Taylor described BZW's performance as inadequate, effectively pulling the division on strong US rivals and been squeezed by the willingness of its continental peers to accept relatively low returns on equity. Because they make comparatively poor returns in their home markets, the returns from UK investment banking look relatively attractive.

The timing of the sale is ironic, coming. just as BZW appeared to be heading in the right directioo again. Interim results in August showed a decline in profits from £148m to £124m, hut that included a £20m derivatives hit, and compared well with the £42m made in the second half of 1996.

Bob Diamond, chief executive of BZW's markets business, is staying with the bank to run Barclays-Capital Group. Jonathan Davie, BZW's deputy chairman, is to chair the businesses that are to be sold. Steve Harker, the head of equities, who was initially reported to have refailed to compete with its enormously signed, is understood to be staying on.

C&W chief could earn £1.7m following 'golden handcuff' package

Cable & Wireless has doubled the share bonus package of Dick Brown, its chief executive, and raised his salary by a third, in an attempt to prevent him from moving to another job. Chris Godsmork, Business Correspondent, reports on a scheme which could see Mr Brown earn £1.7m in this year, but only if he stays on at the company for three Leading shareholders in C&W were told of Mr Brown's pay increase in a recent letter, as the company attempted to gauge reaction to a package which would give him a minimum annual share bonus worth 80 per cent of his salary. The new pay award amounts to a "golden handcuff" arrangement to encourage the Mr Brown, a US citizen who joined C&W in July 1996, to stay at the helm until 2000.

C&W launched the review after fears that Mr Brown would be approached with a job offer from AT&T, the world's second largest phone company. AT&T has been searching for a new chief operating officer after the surprise resignation of John Walter in July. Mr Walter, who was paid $22m when he joined AT&T last year, left after being refused the chairman's job.

It is understood that Brian Smith, C&W's chairman, appointed outside consultaots to review Mr Brown's pay the day after Mr Walter resigned. They measured his salary against other international telecommunications companies, including MCI and AT&T, and found Mr Brown's compared "very unfavourably". C&W declined to comment on whether he had actually made it on to AT&T's shortlist.

C&W yesterday confirmed the details of the package, which included raising Mr Brown's basic salary by a third, from £487,500 to £650,000. The increase took effect during the current financial year, which started on 1 April, despite the fact that some investors have yet to give the company their verdict.

It is the share boous element of the package which is likely to prove the most controversial. C&W has doubled the total possible share bonus award under its long-term incentive plan from 60 per cent to 120 per cent of salary. The new bonus scheme would only take effect if Mr Brown stayed with C&W for three years.

The increase, which applies solely to Mr

Brown, could see him awarded C&W shares worth up to £780,000 this year. To gain the maximum bonus. C&W's earnings have to grow at 15 per ceot above inflation over a three-year period. No changes were made to the performance targets during the pay review.

Most surprisingly, the minimum award of shares possible under the scheme has gone up from 10 per cent of salary to 80 per cent, almost guaranteeing Mr Brown a £520,000 share boous, compared with just £65,000 under the old scheme. The minimum award is paid out if C&W's earnings grow at 2.5 per cent above inflation over a three-year period.

Under the existing remuneration scheme Mr Brown is also entitled to an annual cash bonus on top, worth up to 40 per ceot of salary, which would give him another £260,000. Taken together, the basic salary and short and long-term bonus plans would give Mr Brown £1.69m pay packet this year, assuming C&W meets the top performance criteria. He was paid £1.24m last year, including a £306,517 relocation allowance.

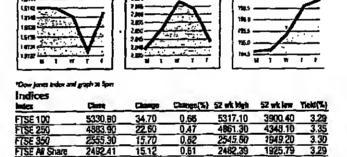

It would make him one of the best paid chief executives of a company in the FTSE 100 share index. Sir Peter Bonfield, chief executive of British Telecom, is on a £570,000 salary. while Sir Iain Vallance, executive chairman, is paid £500.000.

Sources close to C&W indicated big shareholders were mostly happy with the bonus scheme. But one investor canvassed yesterday warned that the increase in the minimum share bonus, with no rise in performance targets, was worrying. "I suspect it's a rather large bonus payment for pretty mediocre performance targets. We would like to see the targets based on peer group comparisons in the telecoms industry and total shareholder returns, includ-

ng share price increases." C&W said Mr Brown's success in his first year had made him a "highly marketable international chief executive". Mr Smith continued: "The chairman's job is to get the best talent and to keep it. I don't want another beadhunting exercise."

The company's prospects have improved markedly under Mr Brown, who joined after the high-profile resignations of Lord Young. chairman, and James Ross, chief executive. He swiftly put together deals to merge Mercury Communications, C&W's main UK husiness, with three cable companies and secured an agreement with China over the future of Hong Kong Telecom, C&W's most lucrative cash cow. Over the past year C&W's share price

Spottiswoode signals her intention to step down

Clare Spottiswoode, the gas industry regulator, is unlikely to stay on in the post when her contract expires next year, unless the Government moves swiftly to merge the electricity and gas watchdogs. Chris Godsmark, Business Correspondent, reports on the growing dilemma for Labour as ministers review the shape of utility regulation.

Ms Spottiswoode, who is paid a salary of £90,000, is understood to be reluctant to continue as gas regulator when her five-year contract at Ofgas, the industry watchdog, comes up for renewal on 31 October 1998. In most previous cases regulators have been asked to stay at the helm for a second term. However, Ms Spottiswoode has warned she is unlikely to commit herself for another five years, though she has not made a final decision.

She would be the second utility regulator to leave the job since Labour came to power. Last month Don Cruickshank, the telephones regulator, said he had decided not to ask for another five-year term at the belm of Oftel, insisting he was looking for new challenges.

It is understood Ms Spottiswoode shares the same worries about her position at Ofgas, after full domestic gas competition is introduced across the UK next summer. She believes most of the big challenges involved in reforming the gas market would have been addressed, leaving her a reduced role in the future.

The much touted merger of Ofgas and Offer, the electricity watchdog, would have encouraged Ms Spottiswoode to seek another term. But she has apparently received no steer from the Department of Trade on when the rationalisation would take place, if at all.

John Battle, industry minister, has previously iodicated he would favour a merger on the grounds that many companies, such as British Gas, are to sell both gas and power. However, Mr Battle has suggested it would be better to wait until the domestic electricity market has opened up, a process which is due to take place next year but is widely expected to be delayed.

It was unclear yesterday whether Ms Spottiswoode had told the Government of her likely decision, though ministers are aware of her keenness to merge Offer and Ofgas. The DTI is reviewing utility regulation and is due to publish a Green Paper oo the whole system in December.

Ms Spottiswoode's reign at Ofgas has heeo cootroversial. She persuaded the Conservative government to push new gas legislation through parliament as the precursor to domestic competition. Trials of residential competition have been a success, despite concerns about billing difficulties and doorstep selling tactics.

Another success was the victory over price controls for the former British Gas's pipeline husiness, Transco. But in recent months she has been under pressure, with fears that low-income customers were getting little benefit from competition, and concerns about selective price cuts introduced by

Glaxo Wellcome ditches Biotech alliance

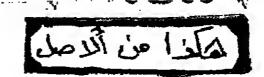

Glaxo Wellcome said yesterday that it would of marimastat, currently in final stage clinical not now proceed with work oo two oew arthritis compounds from British Biotech after toxicity problems forced it to abandon early clinical trials on British Biotech's pill for arthritis and bowel disease. Glaxo had paid British Biotech £11m for the rights to develop the drug, called BB-2983. In a sector already floored by a plague of had news this year, British Biotech's shares fell heavily, closing 10 per cent down at 134p. British Biotech called the news "disappointing," but said that BB-293 was at a very early stage of development, where high failure rates were common. "This is what happens in normal drug development." The company said that although BB-2983 and British Biotech's key uation, taking just 2p off her 150p net present cancer drug marimastat belong to the same class of MMP inhibitor compounds, the development trials, was "completely unaffected".

While both drugs are known to cause joint pain, the toxicity problems which halted the BB-2983 trials were "totally unexpected" and had never been seen in marimastat. The group said that it is currently collecting toxicity data on another of its MMP inhibitors, BB3644 for multiple sclerosis which it is developing itself. British Biotech said the absence of cash from Glaxo for developing the drug was not material to its funding plans. Jo Walton, drug analyst at Leliman Brothers said BB-2983 was never expected to reach market before 2010 and was "irrelevant" to British Biotech's valvalue estimate.

JEREMY WARNER

What happened to vision and ambition?

This has been a bad week for the global ambitions of corporate Britain. BT's plans to merge with MCI of the US and join the super-league of world telecom companies are pretty much dead in the water following the counter bid from WorldCom, while Barclays, our last hope of a British owned global investment bank, yesterday announced that it was throwing in the towel.

Both moves were greeted with visible relief in the City. BT's share price danced for joy, and while reaction to the news from Barclays was a little more muted, everyone agreed it was the right thing for the bank to be doing. What's wrong with our financial markets that they could think in this way? Where's the vision and the ambition for our companies? Where's the chutzpah?

BT forced to abandon its global ambitions? Excellent news, says the City and our mostly enfeebled press. Victory for common sense and all that. Can't let this lot gamble our money away empire building around the world. Barclays to give up on its attempt to create a global investment bank. Shame really that one, but, bey, what chance did they ever have?

Both reactions are understandable enough. A good business and investment case can be made for each of them. But they also seem symptomatic of a wider failure of nerve and imagination.

There's no problem with this sort of thing on Wall Street, which seems only too delighted to back its best industrialists and entrepreneurs as they shoot for the stars. It may be fashionable these days to knock the Continental economics, with their archaic labour and capital markets, but they too seem prepared to take the long view as their corporations prepare for the challenges of the twenty first century and the tegrated world economy.

Not so here in Britain where executive success seems to be measured only in terms of share buyhacks, special dividends and good housekeeping. Here the obsession is with short term shareholder value, the cautious approach and generally reigning in. It's a bad business which future generations will curse us for.

Everything might seem hunky dory in the British economy right now, but the long drawn out post war process of abdicating economic power and influence around the world continues unabated. Cynicism rules our companies as it does our markets. Our opportunity to fight back is being squandered as all around us seize theirs. Our obsession with short term shareholder value perverts our judgement and destroys our purpose.

Britain's failure to create a top notch integrated investment bank capable of competing on a world scale requires some detailed explaining, for of all our post war corporate failings, this one is perhaps the hardest of the lot to understand. Financial services is meant to be one of the things Britain is good at, like pop music, pharmaccuticals and croquet. The City is one of the three great financial centres in the world. In some markets it is now bigger and better than Wall Street. Why is it, then, that no British institution has been able to make a go out of investment banking?

All serious attempts at it - SG Warburg, Kleinwort Benson, NatWest Markets, and now BZW - have foundered essentially on the same thing - they were in the end just too small to succeed. When push came to shove, no one was prepared to invest capital on the scale necessary to make them work. The City has flourished not on its British content, but on foreign capital, institutions and management sys-

Investment banking in its modern form is largely an American creation. The dominant "bulge bracket" houses of New York obtain their bulge from the powerful domestic franchise that the American economy gives them. Furthermore, deregulution came much earlier to Wall Street than the City, giving the Americans an almost unassailable lead in establishing unidifferent activities that make up an in-

By contrast, there is little in the way of domestic franchise to feed the City. Enrope as a single market is still too fragmented and many cultured to provide anything approaching the level of support the American economy gives to Wall Street. Those that succeed in the City must do so on the international stage. Caught between the big global players and the small niche operators, the medium sized British investment bank is finding it progressively harder to compete. As national financial markets transform into global ones, houses like BZW have found themselves caught in a vicious circle of decline. Pay is the major cost in an investment bank and is the primary reason why people want to work in them. To tempt top people with the right areas of expertise away from the bulge bracket firms, BZW found itself having to pay a premium.

Its already unfavourable rates of return would be further damaged in the process and it found itself slipping further and further behind. Inevitably, Martin Taylor, chief executive of Barclays, came to the conclusion that he could flot risk the capital necessary to turn the situation - that BZW would be better off as part of a group fied corporate cultures from the hiend of with complementary franchises in Europe or the United States so that it could share in their economies of scale.

> Put like this, the arguments appear so compelling that It perhaps seems odd it took Barclays so long to see them. It is only a year ago that Mr Taylor hired Bill Harrison, a no nonsense Brummie from Robert Fleming, with the brief of doing what he now thinks impossible, or too high risk to attempt - build a globally competitive investment bank. Just six months ago, Mr Taylor was still refusing to concede defeat. Two events have intervened since then. First, the fall from grace of National Westminster Bank, hung out to dry by its own attempts to huild a global investment bank, Nat West Markets. After all he has achieved at Barclays, Mr Taylor can hardly he blamed for thinking, "oo, er". Second is the merger of Smith Barney and Salomon Brothers in the US. The squeeze BZW is already feeling can only get worse.

All the same, Mr Harrison was never really given the chance to make it work. Perhaps his next port of call should be one of hig Continental hanks, many of whom seem prepared to invest what it takes to succeed in investment hanking. What a shame we are all too scared in Britain to

Transmission merger brings a single ITV company closer

The creation of a single ITY company came a step closer yesterday with news that the network's transmission facilities are to be consolidated. As Cothy Newman reports, streamlining the existing 12 programme transmission centres into fewer than four is likely to cost up to 200 jobs, and could save ITV £15m.

ITV's move to rationalise the way it transmits its programmes reflects the concentration of ownership within the network, and supports suggestions from some observers that ITV may eventually be controlled by a single owner.

A working party has been established to examine how efficiencies could be extracted from the transmission network, and findings are to be presented to key decision-makers at the next meeting of the ITV Council, the network's sovereign body.

Industry sources estimate that around 200 jobs could be eliminated by the rationalisation, ITV would invest some of the money saved - which insiders involved in the working party say could amount to £15m - in its digital terrestrial television output. Extra funds are also likely be poured into programming, which ITV is keen to improve in its battle to maintain audience share against the cable and satellite companies.

The saving would be particularly welcome for ITV, which is to lose the £70m fee it receives from Channel 4 each year.

Outside London, where GMTV, Carlton and LWT share programme transmissionfacilities, each of the franchises has its own centre, despite the fact that Carlton Communications, Granada Group, Scottish Media Group and United, News & Media own 12 franchises between them.

A spokesman for ITV Network Centre yesterday confirmed that the ultimate aim was to replace the 12 centres with one or two and said: "There are a group of ITV companies which are now controlled by far fewer owners, who recognise they are duplicating costs unnecessarily." Industry observers also pointed out that FTV's 12 transmission centres were excessive when compared to Channel 4 or the BBC, which both use a single location to transmit their

Gerry Robinson, chairman of Granada Group, said in June that the ITV companies would merge into a single group within a decade. Over the past four years, the pace of change has been hectic, as ITV faces up to the need for greater consolidation in the face of competition from Channel 4 and 5, and cable and satellite television. In 1993, the 15 franchises were awarded to 14 separate holding companies. Only three independent operators now remain, and one of those - Ulster Television - is looking increasingly vulnerable to a hid from Scottish Media.

So far this year, there have been three ITV mergers. Most recently. United - which owns the Anglia and Meridian franchises - snapped up HTV.

Scottish Media recently bought Grampian and Granada made its long-awaited swoop on Yorkshire-Tyne Tees Television. Granada also owns LWT, and could, according to some City analysts, make a move on Border Television at a later stage.

TOWARDS EMIL; if the line moves towards the German base line it means lovestors no longer require such a high premiors for holding that country's bonds compared to German ones, because they are confident the cumancy won't devalue against the mark. In other words, they think that country will be locked into a single currency with Germany in 10 years' time.

AWAY FROM EMU: However, if they think the country won't be in EMU, that it will have higher inflation, and that there is a risk of a future devaluation against the mark, then they will demand an extra premium for holding that country's bonds, so

EMU hopes raised

Italian political crises aside, confidence that European monetary union will go ahead on time has taken an upswing. The recent leak suggesting the UK will join in the first wave made little difference to sentiment.

Though the leak was supported yesterday by Labour's Peter Mandelson, speaking on Irish television, the Treasury later backtracked, saying Labour's position had not changed.

Gwyn Hacche at James Capel said both Germany and France are more clearly committed to meeting budget deficit targets. Germany now estimates that its 1997 half-year deficit will he 3.1 per cent of GDP, In France, the Socialists. initially resistant to targets, now predict they will achieve a

3 per cent deficit in 1998. Members of the Italian communist party are threatening to derail the government's tough 1998 hudget if proposed pension reforms go through, unsettling the markets. However, Michael Lewis at Deutsche Morgan Greufell said: "The Italians will not allow this crucial budget to be knocked off course."

IN BRIEF

Mobile numbers will be portable from 1999

Mobile phone users will be able to keep their number when they switch to different networks by the end of next year, under plans revealed by Don Cruickshank, the telephones regulator, yesterday. After a long running consultation process with the four mobile companies, Vodafone, Cellnet, Orange and One2One, Mr Cruickshank ruled that operators should introduce number portability from 1 January 1999. Vodafone, which had pushed for a seven-month delay to the process, said the decision was "disappointing", though Orange had pushed strongly for a speedier introduction. The companies were given until 17 October to make a formal response.

Minimum wage warning

Representatives of more than 1,200 companies in the engineering sector yesterday warned the Low Pay Commission about potentially damaging "knock-on" effects of the national minimum wage. The statutory pay limit could mean that employees would seek to maintain wage differentials and some companies would grant such increases in order to attract, motivate and keep highly skilled staff, the Engineering Employers' Federation argued. In its submission yesterday to the Commission, the Federation said that the statutory minimum should be uprated in line with economic circumstances, not annually on the basis of a formula linked to average earnings or inflation.

Alarms offer on the cards

Shares in Tunstall Group rose almost 20 per cent yesterday after news that senior managers were looking at the possibility of making an offer for the alarm systems firm. The company said the interest by senior managers was "at a very preliminary stage".

Seton finance chief leaves

Seton Healthcare, the healthcare group which makes Woodward's gripe water, said yesterday that Roger Humphreys, its finance director, is to resign. He leaves at the end of October to he replaced by Paul Sanders who joins from Arthur Andersen.

Tomkins to buy bakery

Tomkins, the food products company, is to buy Golden West bakery, which supplies McDonald's, for £70m. Golden West. which also makes syrups and ketchups, recorded sales of £69m

Arcadian talks continue

Arcadian International, the hotels and leisure group, said yesterday that talks with a potential bidder were continuing. Chief Executive Robert Breare announced that profits for the six months to July had more than doubled to £1.1m.

Pace lifted on chief appointment

Shares in Pace Micro Technology, which have almost halved since the television set-top box maker floated last year, recovered 3p to 60.5p yesterday after the company finally appointed a new chief executive Makohn Miller, European chief executive of Sega Enterprises, will fill the void left by Barry Rubery, the company's founder who quit last February.

Pace, which came to the market last June at 172p, has been in the doldrums for some time. Digital broadcasting, which will lead to the indroduction of hundreds of new TV channels, has been slow to take off around the world, delaying orders for Pace's set top boxes which are used to decode TV pictures.

Mr Rubery departure coincided with a profits warning. Steve Jones, Pace's finance director and cofounder, also resigned in June.

Mr Miller has been at the Japan-. ese computer games manufacturer since 1994, and is to take his post at Pace before the end of the year. He spent 16 years at Amstrad, the computer and electronics company, and became managing director in 1992.

Peter Morgan, chairman of Pace, said: "He has expertise in the fast-moving competitive electronic retailing field and previous experience as managing director of a public company."

Mr Miller, who is 42, has successfully integrated Sega's consumer division, and has been credited with returning it to profit. At Amstrad, Mr Miller was largely responsible for the acquisitions of Viglen and Dancall. David Hood, another co-founder of Pace who had been sharing the chief executive's role with Mr Morgan, will become director of technology.

Bass, the drinks giant which is keen to expand overseas, having had its bid for Carisberg-Tetley blocked by Margaret Beckett in the UK, now faces a hitter battle with the Japanese bank Nomura in its attempt to grow its Czechoslovakia brewing business.

Bass faces Czech brewing battle

Bass bought its first Czech hrewer four years ago and is now trying to take control of Radegast, the second biggest brewer in the country. Bass has huilt up a 33.4 per cent stake in the company, but yesterday a Czech bank sold its stake to a financial company controlled by Nomura.

Investioni a Postroni Banka (IPB) and its partner Pruni Investioni have sold their combined 15.5 per cent stake in Radegast to IMP Finance, which is controlled by Nomura.

It emerged a month ago that IMP Finance wants to merge Radegast with the largest brewery in the country. Pizenske Brazdroj. Bass has not been informed of the deal. Combined market share of the merged company would total 41 per cent. Bass last week filed a lawsuit against IPB over alleged breaches of nine areas of the Czech commercial code.

The Berber tribes of Morocco's Atlas Mountains have conjured verdant valleys out of a stark and spectacular landscape. So when you find such oases of greenery, you may think you're in a close approximation to paradise. But, says Harriet O'Brien, watch out for the company you are with.

It looked, absurdly, as if we were walking straight into the Garden of Eden itself. There we were in a pink and rocky wilder-Less in the heights of the High Atlas Mountains in southern Morocco. We followed a trickle of running water and, as it got broader, wound our way down into a sudden miracle of greenery: a valley hursting with fig trees, pomegranates and tiny fields of maize. We were accompanied by tle disturbs the tranquillity here: there's practically no crime, not much violence (certainly no drunkenness; this is a good Muslim area), and, so they claim, few serpents.

But perhaps they're reckoning without the tourists.

We had just finished peeling off our walking boots and examining our blisters, trophies of the day's challenge, when the boy and girl racers of the adventure travel world swept up. From about 6.30 that evening the mountain bikers straggled in. all Lycra, sweat and Oakley sunshades, collapsing exhausted into the gite in the little Berber village of Wawriykt. Hikers and bikers, we quickly discovered, create their own uneasy culture clash. Particularly when they are squeezed into a confined space in a remote Moroccan village whose population they have just swollen by nearly a quarter. Space was one thing, attitude quite an-

And with reason. Not only is this a cheap their 10-day trip. Meanwhile, squashed together, sitting on the floor at the far end of the gite's overcrowded dining- and sleeping-area, we walkers listened and looked on with indignation. Baz, we appreciated, was speaking in slight jest, but we couldn't help-feeling that beneath this attempt at humour there was a jarring lack of respect for the local community. And, what was worse, privately we realised that we ourselves were not above reproach. Outwardly, however, we clung precar-iously to the moral high ground. We had booked with the same tour operator as the cyclists. But as walkers we liked to think of ourselves as socially and environmentally sensitive travellers: a group of nine who had signed up for five days' hiking in a starkly spectacular landscape, leaving (as green campaigners urge) only footprints.

It was to be, so the Exodus Travels brochure and itinerary had implied, a holiday on the comfortable side of basic: four nights sleeping inside, or on the roof - under the stars - of a Berber home turned gite. This had the comparative luxury of two Asian-style loos, two cold showers and,

Numbers would, the innerary had stated, be limited to fewer than 12. and fairly convenient area to reach (air fares to Marrakesh, a two-hour bus ride from the mountain range, are a lot lower than those to Asia), it also offers a staggering landscape of awe-inspiring panoramas; strange, vividly coloured rock formations; and, of course. magically green valleys above which nestle little mud-brick Berber villages.

All of which sound like great ingredients for a challenging fresh-air boliday. The reality, though, can be gruelling for those who, literally, don't have the stomach or time to acclimatise to some rough going.

For a start, the local Berber people rightly think you're nuts as you clomp off, walking through the heat of the day to arid, empty spaces. It's tough terrain, too: lose your concentration as to where you're placing each foot and you could stumble badly over the rocks, doing yourself a serious injury in the middle of nowhere. And then there's the harsh, unrelenting sun: our group went down like ninepins as heatstroke exacerbated any queasy unfamiliarity with the local food.

48 hours in the life of ... Lisbon

You need a break - and a shortcut to the soul of a city. This week, Simon Calder checks out a capital caught between centuries.

Why go now?

Because the fragile façades of Lisbon, which endow the Portuguese capital with such soul, are crumbling rapidly beneath an onslaught of modernity: while half the city is being dug up for the new subway, the other half is being refurbished for next year's Expo. New, cheap flights have opened up the city as an accessible weekend destination. And it's one Continental capital where you don't have to adjust your watch.

Beam down

The lowest fare to Lisbon is likely to be nn AB Airlines (0345 464748) from Gatwick; flying next weekend, the cheapest return is £131 including tax. Portugalia (0990 502048) flies from Manchester, but not at weekends; leaving next Friday and returning on Monday costs £201. British Airways (0345 222111) and TAP Air Portugal (017t-828 0262) fly from Heathrow.

Get your bearings

toms hall at the airport (open 6am-2am) will provide you with a map of the city. The Aero-Bus runs to the centre between 7am and 8.40pm daily; as Lisbon airport is so close in, a taxi costs only £4.

The city sprawls along the north shore of the Tagus, but you need focus on only three basic areas. The flat part in the middle is Baixa (pronounced bye-sha). Rising to the west is Bairro Alto (approximately biru altu), and to the east Alfama,

Check in

Aim for the centre, Bairro Alto and Baixa have plenty of modest options; in the former, the Pensao Londres (rua Dom Pedro V 53, 00 351 1 346 2203) charges 6,200-9,200 escudos for a double room, corresponding to £21-£31. In Baixa, the Pensao Insulana at rua da Assunção 52 (00 351 1 342 3131) offers good value at 8,500 (£29) per night, including bathroom and TV. Breakfast is included in all these rates.

Take a ride

Tram 28 is one of Europe's great little journeys - an exercise in kinetic eccentricity as it sways up improbable gradients and squeezes through impossible gaps. Summer visitors missed out on the full glory of the route, but track repair work has now finished. For 150 escudos (about 50 pence), ride the whole, hilariously convoluted journey from Prazeres, west of Bairro Alto, to the square named Martim Moniz (north of Baixa).

Take a hike

The tram reveals Lisbon to be defiantly three-dimensional. From its eastern terminus, steer a southerly course to touch down amid the swirl of traffic around Baixa. Stay on the same heading, and soon you reach the foot of an Eiffel-designed lift called the Elevador Santa Justa. It hauls you from humdrum sea level to a higher plane. Sadly, subway work means you can't step deftly from the viewing platform into Bairto Alto; instead, descend again and wend your way there on a warm autumnal walk.

Lunch on the run

By the time you huff to the top end of rua Garrett, you'll need a coffee and pastry. The fine old Café A Brasileira, half hidden by subway hoardings, is a grand hall of age-darkened wood and fresh, young faces reflected in a million mirrors. Lisbon's intelligentsia natters here for hours.

Cultural afternoon

Lisbon's chief civic characteristic is nattering in cafés, but there is also a streak of diligence - manifested at the Museu da Agua. Take a taxi to avoid a long, frustrating walk in an area where few seem to know of its existence. The reward is a palace of engi-The helpful tourist office outside the cus-neering, a frenzy of brass and steel in a former pumping station built in the days when municipal magnificence was mandatory.

Window shopping

The funniest piece of public transport in Lisbon is the Elevador da Bica, in which a lop-sided tram shuffles up and down a steep gradient. Near the top end is Work in Progress, an intriguing combination of clothes store, hairdresser and (possibly crucial as dusk gathers strength) a jolly har.

An aperitif

Yet another Elevador - this one named Gloria - eievates you to the Solar do Vinho do Porto (Port Wine Institute). Subside into the deep leather armchairs of this handsome chamber of commerce, and choose something white and chilled from among hundreds of varieties of port.

Demure dinner

For quiet elegance, best stay at home; Bairro Alto on a Saturday night is not a peaceful place to he. But it possesses a staggering selection of restaurants on and around rua do Diario de Noticias.

hikes in the High Atlas. For independent travellers, Marrakesh is the best gateway. In October, Royal Air Maroc (0171-439 4361) has daily flights from Heathrow via Casablanca for £360 including tax. For the same fare, GB Airways (a British Airways affiliate. 0345 222111) flies from Gatwick on Tuesday and

Friday via Gibraltar. Moroccan Information and Advice Centre, 61 Golborne Road, London W10

A tale of two flights - each announced this week, each using a chartered Boeing 757, but, I suspect, resulting in very different experiences.

Every winter, Britain's charter airlines face the same problem: how to make use of planes and crews when no one wants to fly anywhere much? All sorts of solutions are tried. Earlier this year, for example, cabin crew for Monarch Airlines found themselves routinely saddled with the arduous task of spending seven days in a luxury hotel in Costa Rica. This was the the happy consequence of Monarch's once-aweek charter to Central America; it was cheaper to leave the crew in San José awaiting the next inbound flight than to fly them back to Britain.

Now Air 2000 - which, by the way, has yet to take up any of the suggestions offered by readers of this column to change its time-sensitive name - has announced a neat answer to the winter dol-: drums. As soon as the summer '98 schedules finish, the airline will rip out the 233 legroom-challenged seats from a Boeing 757 and replace them with just 92 first class armchairs. The plane then embarks on 25-night tour of the East, visiting "lost cities" such as Samarkand and Angkor Wat. The price: £17,469 all in.

If that sounds a tad too expensive, you could try a lengthy journey at the opposite end of the juxury scale. Five weeks from today, the charter airline Canada 3000 begins flights to Australia.

Nothing new in that, of course; Britannia Airways started charters to Australasia a decade ago. Britannia uses a wide-bodied 767, but Canada 3000 will employ a narrow-bodied 757. And while Britannia flies the well-established easterly route, stopping twice on its 25hour journey from Gatwick to Sydney, Canada 3000 seems intent on a tour of 1 most of the airports in the western hemisphere.

A few hours after taking off from Gatwick, passengers will find themselves touching down to refuel at the NATO base in Keflavik, Iceland. Then, in none-too-quick succession, you visit Vancouver, Honolulu and Fiji. Having lost a day at the International Date Line, you finally reach Sydney about 34 hours after leaving Sussex.

While your befuddled brain tries to work out where you are and what day it is, take comfort from the shock awaiting the hig-budget travellers abound their Air 2000 private jet. In Cambodia, the group will overnight at the comfortable Phnom Penh Sofitel, no doubt looking forward to the following day's excursion to Angkor Wat - one of the undisputed wonders of the East.

When they get the capital's airport, though, they will discover that instead of their luxurious Boeing 757, they are obliged to travel in a Royal Air Cambodge aircraft. When I took this flight, it was aboard a doddery oid Antonov; the "bodge" part of the airline's name was explained when the cabin filled with hillowing clouds of condensation immediately after take-off. The airline has since replaced its Soviet aircraft with European prop-jets, but 1 bet the catering hasn't improved enough to live up to the "first class service all the way" tag. All in all, I'd rather fly to Keffavik.

From previous page satisfaction. Those of us who retained the energy were taken over lunar-like landscapes to far-flung desert lakes and waterfalls. We walked for miles through scenery untamed by mankind, clambering through great canyons of boulders, weaving our way across aromatic plains of wild thyme where swooping house martins and silky lizards provided rare signs of life. And, just when we thought we'd sweated our way well beyond reach of civilisation, lunch could come trotting past on the back of a mule. About half-an-hour further on we would find a meal impec- jealously guarded sleeping spaces on the cably laid out on a rug, with the mule driver brewing up peppermint tea which he would ceremoniously serve in a polished pewter teapot. This exercise in neat planning and delicate politeness was, we rapidly appreciated, one of the advantages joining an organised tour.

In fact, it might all have been a happy experience were it not for the 16 mountain hikers and the feet-bad factor that came in their wake. Back at the gite we snaried at them with a dog-in-themanger-like attitude as they tripped over our walking boots and encroached on our cations of such numbers, and we sneered at their shiny Lycra thighs - how inappropriate in a cover-up country like And then we realised that, probably, they were just like us: tourists in search of a hit of adventure, wanting some understanding of the people and the places they were travelling through.

It was simply that, owing to the oversight of a tour operator back in Britain, there were too many of us. Lumped together we became an invading army. threatening the finely halanced ecology

Outlook For Today

The British Isles

It will be cloudy across Scotland with hill fog and light rain or drizzle, although the southeast should stay dry. Later in the day some heavier rain will break out in the north and north-west. Northern Ireland and north-west England will have a few spots of drizzle possihle. Over the hills and some coasts it will be misty. Wales and the rest of England should stay dry with some brightness. Cloud in the east and south-east will break and a little sunshine will break through in most areas.

Rain over Scotland will spread across Northern Ireland and into northern England, with a few heavy bursts still possible. North-west Scotland will turn more showery with some hrightness later. Wales and the rest of England will be dry through most of the day with spells of sunshine. However, there is the threat of heavy showers or thunderstorms moving up from the south, affecting southwest England and south Wales in the evening.

The crescent Moon clusters with brilliant Venus and the rather dimmer Mars and Antares iow in the south-west at sunset (6.30 pm. BST), tomorrow (5 October) and Monday (6 October).

Following the new Moon last Wednesday, a clear sky at dusk this weekend wilt reveal the slender crescent of the new Moon low over the south-west horizon. Tomorrow the three-day-oid Moon hangs in the sky just above Venus. Though Venus is very low by the time the Sun is setting at 6.30pm, BST, its sheer brilliance comhined with the Moon to guide the eye should make it detectable where the horizon is uncluttered. Mars is also in the same area of sky, but is five magnitudes fainter than Venus. It is a much more difficult prospect without the aid of binoculars. Curiously, the nearest bright star in Mars is currently its rival in name and colnur-Antares, and they are exactly the same hrightness. Don't confuse the two. By Monday night, the enlarging crescent of the Moon roughly forms a line with Venus and Mars. By night, with floodlights oozing halos in the haze around its towers and walls, Riquewihr looked the part: a perfectly preserved medieval town. And inside the gates, despite the hive of activity up the cobbled Grand Rue, its restaurants serving backaoffa and tartes flambees added the finishing touches.

The air was smokily autumnal but still T-shirt warm and, as has happened every October for perhaps 2,000 years, over everything hung the heady, sweet smell of newly fermenting wine. People nibbled fresh walnuts, and every glass seemed filled with bubbling, milky neier siasser - wine from the grapes picked a few days before. In Alsace the vendange was coce again in full swing.

The Alsatian Route des Vins winds its way 100 miles or so from near Strasbourg down past Colmar and between hthe west bank of the Rhine and the soaring escarpment of the Vosges mountains. It looks as wine country should, with scores of ancient villages picture-postcard pretty. Any one of Restored by Kaiser Wilhelm, it is now them would be a pleasure to visit, hut Riquewihr, at the heart of it all, is something else again.

It sits cramped inside its ring of medieval walls with scarcely a stone younger than the 16th century. There are mazes of alleys between carved and timbered houses. There are flowers everywhere. Riquewihr may not be big. but you can lose a whole day there. In the Thieves Tower you can view the medieval torture chamber. The beadquarters of Hugel et Fils, founded in 1639 (family wine firms seldom come older) will have you reaching for a fresh roll of film.

From the top edge of the vineyards the dense Vosges forest, full of deer and wild boar, rises in ooe sweep to 4,000ft. We set off to explore. At vendange Riquewihr wakes early and as we left the little town the first tractor-load of grapes was already coming in to start the queue for the press. It was one of those mornings of mist and mellow fruitfulness. We could not, in fact, see much, but following the Sambach back towards the beights we filled our rucksacks with sweet chestnuts that were falling down around us on to the forest floor. Later, we found ceps. The crests of the Vosges are serrated with old castles. The monolithic Haut-Koenigsbourg is today the most famous.

Our map told us that somewhere in the mist was the castle of the Bilstein. Suddenly we emerged into bright sunshine and saw the tower, engulfed by greenery, perched on a crag. It seemed to float, an island in an ocean of vapour. Clearly, few people came here. We ate our picnic lunch reclining against its sun-warmed sandstone; to our north and south were other islands,

The men who had them built were not prompted by the picturesque. Since before the days of the Romans this has been a sporadic battleground. And yet the centuries of shifting borders, sometimes Freoch, sometimes German, bave resulted in an intriguing amalgam of the Gallic and the Teutonic.

Alsace manages its languages without a second thought. The local daily appears in two editions - every story, every ad, word for word the same, but one in French, the other in German. People talking in the street slip easily from one language to the other.

The vine leaves had turned golden and the vineyard seemed to glow, the town walls at its foot shimmered in the sun. Jokingly they offered us an opportunity to help, showing us how to use the secateurs to cut clusters of some of the world's most expensive riesling grapes. After only half-an-hour our wrists were aching. Yet from dawn to dusk they had been harvesting for more than a week. Meanwhile, down in Riquewihr, every few hours a cavalcade of battered vans their harvest was in.

Later that day we searched out the Bronners at what looked like a tiny house; inside, however, there was the gargantuan kitchen, one corner of which was takeo up by a wine press. Here we were offered generous glasses of Schoenenbourg grand cru. Theo M Bronner fetched six bottles from the cellar and stuck oo the lahels he keeps in the kitchen drawer. As a finishing touch he gave us a little discount, as wages for our work in the vineyard.

A tack is the best form of defence

A Barbadian idyll turns sour when the beach vendors move in.

That's the time, says Mognus Mills, to seek sanctuary on the ocean waves.

The aloe vera man had spotted me again. Whenever he saw me sitting on the beach rubbing sun cream into my white British legs he would settle down nearby and begin chopping up a thick green stem with his machete. His plan was to mash up the pieces, squeeze them into a bottle and sell me the contents. Only pure aloe vera, he told me repeatedly, would protect me from the hlazing sun. Unable to convince him that I was quite happy with my sun cream, I headed for my usual means of escape: the water sports centre.

This was, in fact, a small but situated beneath a coconut palm, but the sign said "water sports centre". Minutes later I was 100 yards from the shore in my Sunfish sailhoat, safe from the aloe vera man.

Mind you, I wouldn't have been surprised if he'd come swimming after me. Of all the beach vendors on this side of Barbados, the aloe vera man was the most persistent. He did have a living to make, after all, and there was a lot of competition. An endless procession of vendors sold everything anyone needed for life on the sand. Cocomits, colourful print shirts, sun hats. I liked to imagine that there was a guy at the end of the beach checking all the vendors through a turnstile every 30 seconds or so.

Few of them managed to bother me, of course, because I was out in my Sunfish most of the day. These attractive little hoats are perfect for the warm Caribbean waters. You can learn to sail them in about 20 minutes - they practi- retreat, for ever, beneath a starry sky on Barbados looked even more beautiful when seen offshore over the gunwale of a tiny boat with a red-and-white-striped sail. I could lie with my feet over the side listening to the cricket commentary on my transistor radio. St Vincent vs Dominica.

Then one day I arrived at the water sports centre and found that sailing was cancelled. A red flag had been stuck in the sand to signal that the breakers were too hig for safe launching.

An unwelcome cold front had apparently upset the usually tranquil sea. The hotel manager assured me that this kind of thing happened on only 10 or 12 days a year at the most.

Why not simply enjoy the very blueness of the sea?" he suggest

I spent the day drinking Bank's, the local beer, and discussing the very blueness of the sea with some German girls I met sunbathing along the beach. That night my wife defeated me thoroughly, comprehensively and categorically, at table tennis.

It gets dark very rapidly after sunset in the West Indies. The sunset itself happens quickly and with a sudden colour splash, and then, as the crickets begin madly rubbing their legs together and the rest of the tropical wildlife join in the chirping chorus, it's time to find a beach bar for the

We sat beneath spinning fans in a large, open-sided restaurant built on wooden stilts above the sea at Mullins Bay. I wondered if the local people ever get fed up with the constant sound of waves gently lapping the shore, over and over, surge and cally sail themselves, anyway. Up and down this warm rim of the Atlantic Ocean.

The next day was my last on Barbados and I decided to see how far I could sail in my Sunfish. I left the beach and headed due west in the direction of St Vincent. Further and further I went, until I felt that to those on the shore I would be no more than a tiny speck on the horizon. All right, so I only went about a mile out -but at last I felt the true freedom of being at sea in an open boat. And immediately I began to wonder whether there were dangerous sharks in those waters. There aren't, so I was later told.

Not until the coconut and almond trees lining the shore became no more than an indistinguishable green barrier, did I turn hack. The swell had risen and for some reason the sun had gone behind a cloud. As I approached the shore I could see the guys from the water sports centre standing there, waiting. They stood motionless beside the little hut under the coconnt palm.

"Hi, guys." I called, as I pulled up the rudder and surfed safely back on to the "Great sail," I said, as they took hold of the boat and pulled it the last few yards up the sand. "I went out as far as I could

No reply. In silence they took down the mast, folded up the sails and locked them in the hut. The holiday was over.

Scheduled flights to Barbados are available from Heathrow on BWL4 (0181-577 1100) and from Gatwick on British Airways (0345 222111). Charters and package holidays are offered by a range of companies, such as Thomson, Airtours, First Choice and Unijet.

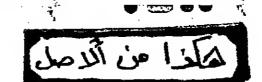

HIGH ROAD

The term "compulsory half-board" may have alarming resonances of public school for some, but in the new brochure from Tradewinds (0870-751 0005) it applies to the more benign institution known as Cobblers Cove in Barbados, a five-star hotel that is part of the Relais & Chateaux group. A week there departing 12 April next year, staying in a deluxe suite and flying Club World on British Airways, will cost a shade over £4,000 per person -Including the compulsory half-board supplement.

LOW ROAD

The company that pioneered low-cost Caribbean holidays was Airtours (01706 232323); a decade ago, it began charter flights to the region and offered prices as low as £299 for a week. The cheapest Airtours package to Barbados next 12 April costs £589, staying at the Pirate's Inn. While you enjoy the same sun and sea as the High Road contingent who are paying seven times as much, you may be amused to reflect that Tradewinds is merely the upmarket brand name of Fresh from a pasting in the Ashes, England expects ... to be pounded by the best pace attack in the world. But even if events don't go our way on the field in this winter's West Indies Test tour. there's no better place to suffer than the Caribbean. writes Daniel Synge.

Cold, dark days and the present onslaught of Premiership football mean that supporters of the summer game must tearfully consign their white floppy sun hats to the recesses of their sock drawers and dream of palm-fringed cricket. Unless, that is, they make for the likes of Jamaica's Sabina Park or Trinidad's Queen's Park Oval.

Those undeterred by the fact that England's Ashes cause died on a soggy Yorkshire field back in July are now booking trips To the Caribbean this winter, where they in Crawley, Snow offers package will combine watching Test matches with a tropical beach holiday.

Indies. The 3-1 humiliation in 1994 hardly augurs well for England's hopes, but happy memories will be evoked by that series' Barhados Test when hundreds of rum-fuelled Brits merrily invaded the Kensington Oval after England's historic win. And who could deny them their moment? Buoyed by the sunshine, a relentless carnival atmosphere and electric performances oo the field, some England fans discovered that there is nothing quite like witnessing a cricket match in the Caribbean.

Tours for sports supporters are hardly a new concept, but they are a growing one. Travel operators are already reporting a record demand for flights, with 10,500 England supporters expected on the islands this winter, there could be a shortage of botel beds. "We may even end up using boats in the harbour as floating hotels," warns John Snow, who was a member of the last victorious England team to tour the West Indies, back in 1968. Now running his own sports travel business deals starting at £1.455 (for 15 nights during the Second Test in Port of nationals, with extra days allowed for lazing on the beach or trying water sports. Diehard fans can even oot for a hall-by-ball tour of the whole England itinerary. The cost? About £17,500 from Calypso Gold tours. But like most package holidays, a cricket tour just wouldn't be the same without those little extras that are thrown in to keep the fans happy when they have spent the day watching England fielders chase Brian Lara's cover drives. Specialist tour operators offer a variety of action. ITC Sports enlists Radio 4 Test Match Special's Trevor Bailey, who will be arranging "informal games of golf". Fred Rumsey (himself a former player) has Godfrey Evans, David Capel and Peter Martin on the celebrity roster. In some cases you could find yourself playing beach cricket against local opposition, or even end up meeting the England team.

Probably the best reason for following an England cricket team around the Caribhean, with or without the help of a specialist tour company, is to sample the spirit of the islands from the boundary edge. Needless to say, the formalities of a county pavilion should be left behind with the embroidered hlazer. "In Antigua you sit where you can, even if it means climbing a tree," recalls one veteran of the 1994 campaign.

hopes singlehandedly in 1994. And when not running a stall in downtown St John's, Gravy dresses up in a nurse's uniform and helps rally the Antiguan crowd. Away from the cricket, the tours are as varied as the islands themselves. Barbados, with its Little England feel and wide choice of water sports, drew a record 6,000 English supporters last time round. Antigua, with its reputed 365 beaches, is almost as popular. But the rawest and least visited venue has to be Georgetown, Guyana; the only Test venue in on John Snow's trip to the third Test explore a vast rainforest, plus a visit to the Kaiteur Falls, the world's Guyana, even if it's a bit rickety," he says.

Idyllic beaches, though, are definitely not part of the deal. "If you want to go and lie on a beach, you'll find yourself in 6in of mud," adds Snow.

Arguably the most attractive cricket ground in the world is the tiny Amos Vaic, on the island of St Vincent. Two one-day matches will be played there in March. "It's practically on the beach," says Don Gooding, of Calypso Gold, whose trips feature rum punch receptions and the chance to talk cricket with Michael Holding and Sir Gary Sobers.

Africa is, of course, famous for its wildlife. But what about the people who live alongside it? In recent years many tribal peoples have found themselves pushed off their land so that foreign tourists on safari can come and see the protected wildlife, and, increasingly, they are living in poverty outside the national parks.

However, a number of communities in Kenya are taking back control. More animals are now migrating outside the parks than previously, and local people have begun to market these areas to tourists. A Masai community 25km east of Amboseli National Park has sec up

Kimana Wildlife Sanctuary - the first ever to be owned and run by the Masai. It contains lions, leopards, elephants and other game and has three tented camps and one tourist lodge. The Masai charge foreign businesses to run the camps and spend the revenue on new schools, dispensaries and cattle dips. Some money is also put aside to help those whose livestock may have been killed by wild animals, or who are particularly affected during times of drought.

Eselenkei Conservation Area, 17km north of Amboseli National Park, has also been established with local · communities in mind. The British tour operator Tropical Places, and the Masai people, have established the conservation area and have agreed to limit tourist numbers in the 200-sq-km area to 60 at one time. Tropical Places has been given exclusive rights to build a small lodge on condition that local workers are given preference, and that rent, bed-night and entrance fees for each visitor are paid to the Masai, Profits will be used for education and agricultural support.

The wise traveller will heed the advice of those who have gone hefore, particularly those who write guidebooks to unfamiliar destinations. But in some cases the danger is that you will be deterred from enjoying a country to the full if the risks are overstated. This, I found, was the case with the section on women travellers in the current edition of Lonely Planet's guide to Morocco.

"Western (and especially blonde, fair-skinned) women will find they have constant male company at various times during their stay in Morocco," it said. "Harassment usually takes the comparatively harmless form of learing sometimes being followed and occasionally being touched up."

Arriving in Marrakesh, I was therefore prepared for the sort of hassle I had experienced in northern India earlier this year. So at first I dressed and acted like a Victorian governess - long skirts, long sleeves, no eye contact - and was rejuctant to wander the souks and

Don't be a downhill fool

When was the last time you bought ski insurance? The chances are that it was before I April. In which case you could be in for e shock when you see this season's premiums, writes Stephen Wood

On April Fool's Day this year - a curiously appropriate date - the tax on most travel insurance increased by 15 per cent. At the same time new EU regulations gave UK skiers the right to go to the front of all skilift queves.

OK, I was lying about that last bit. But we all know - the statistics prove it - that nobody is interested in travel insurance; so I had to do something to keep your attention. Now that I have it, I promise that if you get to the end of this article you will have read a bizarre story, and learned how. to save yourself at least a few pounds on this season's skiing.

When Insurance Premium Tax (IPT) weot up in April, the basic rate increased from 2.5 to 4 per cent. But for some classes of insurance, including travel insurance sold by travel agents and tour operators, the tax leapt up to 17.5 per cent.

Why was this? In the insurance trade, they offer a remarkable explanation. In re- it comes to insurance. cent years, it has been a common practice for travel agents to offer discounts on skiing and other holidays; but to qualify for the discount, the customer also has to buy insurance from the travel agent. The agent loses some of the profit on the holiday in order to make a profit on the insurance - where the normal retail margin is 35 per cent. This technique echoes a similar one in electrical goods retailing, where discounts are linked to extended-warranty insurance.

. The Government did not like what the electrical goods retailers were doing, because while electrical goods are subject to VAT, insurance is not. So to make sure it didn't lose out, it increased the IPT on extended warranties for domestic appliances to 17.5 per cent - exactly the rate of VAT. At the same time, and - say the insurers - for the same reason, IPT on insurance sold by tour operators and travel agents was also increased to 17.5 per cent.

VAT on holidays.

Whether the insurance trade's cock-up theory - that the government wroogly believed holidays were subject to VAT - is insurance potentially an even more expensive part of skiing holidays: a skier over 65 years old can buy a coe-week package in North America for £360, hut the insurance policy in this year's brochures would add £112 to that. With a 15 per cent hike in agents' and operators' IPT (from 2.5 per cent, before April 1, to 17.5 per cent), skiers have no choice but to buy their insurance elsewhere, from brokers and

That should be true; but it isn't. According to Sarah Joannides of Home and many trade clients (including Thomsoo's ski programme), its sales of policies through tour operators and travel agents have inearly days, of course, in the ski booking season; but Joannides says that wheo it comes to buying travel insurance people don't behave rationally because "they just don't want to think about it". They linger on the pleasurable part of choosing the holiday, she says, and then opt for convenience when

Michael Pettifer, the ski insurance expert at Hamilton Barr brokers, believes that "the travel insurance market is split into three parts. About 70 per cent of customers buy

It goes without saying that all skiers

need to steer their skis to change direction and stay in control. This movement sometimes looks and feels like squashing a cigarette under your

they want to travel.

The flaw with this reasoning? There is oo from a travel agent or tour operator, and 10-15 per cent don't buy insurance at all they choose not to, forget, or mistakenly believe that they are adequately covered by a credit card or the E111 reciprocal medicalcorrect or not, the effect has been to make care arrangement for the EU. And that leaves only 15 per cent or so with banks, building societies and insurance brokers."

This year, that 15 per ceof of customers stand to save up to £10 on their ski insurance. Among the hig six tour operators, the brochure price for a week's insurance at a European ski resort averages £41, and most travel agents - not all, because the tax increase has led some to cut their commission - are charging a similar premium. Thanks to IPT, the differential between brochure rates and those a broker will charge has shot up: buy a policy Overseas, which provides insurance for through the insurance trade rather than the travel trade and it can cost as little

This puts a broker such as Hamilton creased by 10 per cent this year. These are Barr in a curious position. It will insure 100,000 skiers this season, about 20 per cent of the whole UK market; and since most of its policies are sold by travel agents the prices include the 17.5 per cent IPT which the agent has to pay. But you can get exactly the same policies at a lower price (starting from £31 instead of £35.40) if you buy through a broker, or direct from Hamilton Bar. It is, as Michael Pettifer, of Hamilton Barr, admits, "completely crazy".

It is always worth phoning around to get a keen price on ski insurance. And the more you do it, the more you realise how true that is - particularly for skiers more than 65 years old. For people of that age, the Thomson insurance policy for North America doubles: for a week's skiing, you would pay £112. But Hamilton Barr's prices double only at the age of 70: its top "Excel" policy still costs £57.20 for those in the 65-70 age group, even if they huy through a travel agent and pay 17.5 percent tax. That's aiready a saving of almost £55. How much would it cost to buy direct? It's worth a few phone calls to find out.

The killing field

Now's the time to arm yourself to the teeth and commit carnage in the garden. Illustration by Sally Kindberg.

Having arrived in a place that grew little but elder and nettle. I've been obsessed since we've been here with planting, planting, planting. Show me a bare bit of earth and I would ram something in it.

But we've been in our bouse loog enough now for the things we've planted to have done a lot of growing. For a time I persuaded myself that the bank was a romantic jungle. Now I am forced to the far less pleasant conclusion that it's a mess. Something has to go, and if it's not me it has to be them - the plants that have grown too hig for their situation or have not delivered what I was hoping for.

So I have been flailing around like Vlad the Impaler, uprooting, burning, creating mayhem. I always supposed I was a pacifist. It's quite frightening to discover this latent ability to deal death and destruction all round.

Usually I find myself apologising to plants I dig up and explaining why they've got to go. Not now. "Look." I said to 'Agnes', the rugosa rose on the bank. "You've had 15 years to get your act together. I was promised big, double, amber-yellow flowers, heavily sceoted. I was promised bushy, dense, clean foliage. And what have I had? Long, scraggy growths. No flowers. Horrid rust-riddeo leaves. Enough already."

Usually, too, I think it must be my fault rather than the plant's if it's not doing well. For years I've had this notion that everything that goes wrong in the garden is down to me. In general, that is better than supposing problems always to be someone's else's fault, but suddenly I am tired of guilt. I've dooe all I can for this rose: pruned it, mulched it tenderly with the best cow dung that Dorset can provide, kept it free from hindweed. It's been a one-way relationship and I've had enough. It's gone. Burnt. Destroyed.

It's a heady feeling. Now I'm looking far more critically at plants on the bank with the suspicion that space - pure, calm, open, airy space - would be better, in one or two other places, than the existing muddle. It's so dense, that growth on the bank new, so congested, that not enough plants come into the spotlight.

The process started with the ceanothus that we tore out from the front of the bank would have caught your eye and felt unto make more room for small plants and comfortable:

bulbs. But getting rid of the ceanothus also brought back into prominence the aralia 100. Left to itself it would make a big, behind it. I had always intended the aralia, a lovely Aralia elata 'Variegata', to be the key plant in this particular patch. The ceanothus (C thyrsiflorus var repens) was supposed to sprawl low in front of it. Instead, it reared up and up and completely dominated everything around it.

The slow-growing aralia couldn't fight back fast enough. In winter, its framework is reduced to its few strange, stubby, upright stems. But the ceanothus was evergreen and grew so fast that when the time came for the aralia's fabulous great pinnate leaves to unfold in April, there was nowhere for them to go. Now it is breathing easy, the 3ft leaves balanced out horizontally like the hranches of a cedar.

Making space, taking things out, need not be as wholesale as it has been with the 'Agnes' rose and the ceaoothus. Sometimes cutting out branches is enough. Lifting the canopy of trees by taking out one or two of the lowest branches is a surprisingly effective way of gaining more gardening room. This is what I need to do with the evergreen Portuguese laurel under which a hig De-caisnea fargesii is growing. I wouldn't want to be without the laurel entirely. It stands on the boundary between us and our neighbour and provides useful cover. It also shelters our garden from the prevailing south-westerly winds. But it is a dense tree, and the decaisnea tends to lean out from under it and wave its great leaves (pinnate leaves about 3ft long) over the lawn. Then the grass

If we take out a few of the laurel's lowest branches so that it doesn't sit quite so heavily on the decaisnea's head, the decaisnea itself will feel that it can grow up into the vacuum that has been created, rather than reaching out over the lawn. The laurel branches could have been just cut back, rather than taken away entirely, but I don't think the effect would have been good. The unnatural truncation shortly coming to them. I'm off now with

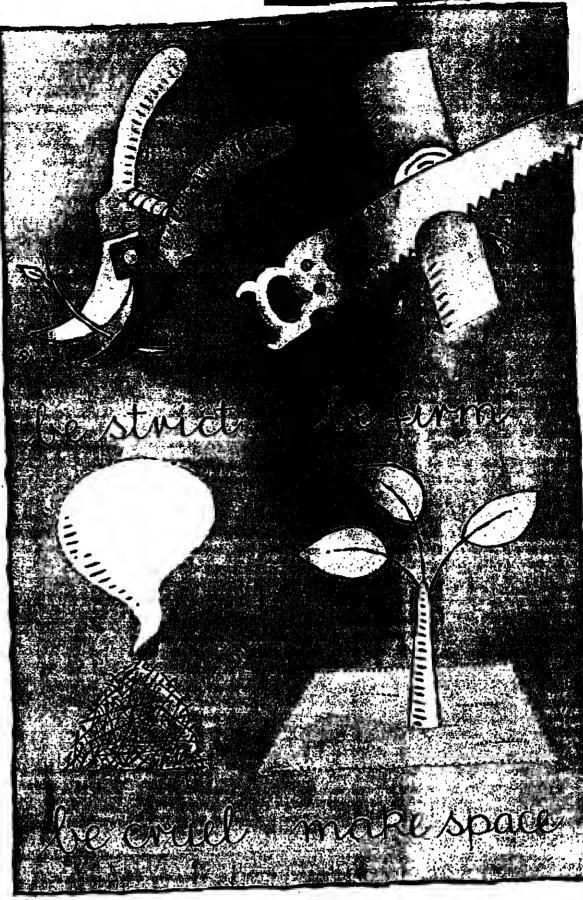

The decaisnea itself needs cutting back, multi-stemmed shrub at least 15ft tall and wide. But like many multi-stemmed shrubs (cotoneaster, philadelphus, etc) it can easily be kept at a more manageable size if you regularly take out one or two old stems each year.

I won't do that now. Even in the white heat of my Impaler mode, I recognise that this is 100 good a shruh to risk losing. Pruning always kicks a plant into top gear. But you don't want new growth produced at a time when it may be frosted. It will be safer to attack the decaisoea after it has flowered, in May next year. And if I cut it now, I would lose many of the seed pods that are one of the reasons for growing the shruh. They are weird, the size and shape of sausages, but navy blue.

The cotooeaster is different. It seeded itself into the bank and because there was nothing much else there at the time, I left it. It is Cotoneaster simousii, with small, oeat leaves and oval fruit, turning now in bright orange-red. It comes from Sikkim and Bhutan and makes generally upright growth, about 8ft tall. It's a shrub you can't find any fault with, but, at the same time, not one that ever stops you in your tracks, the way the aralia and the decaisnea do.

WJ Bean, author of the monumental, four-volume Trees and Shrubs Hardy in the British Isles, says C simonsii is "well able to take care of itself". Good. I needn't feel sorry for it when the saw starts to bite. Two of the upright growths have taken a decided turn towards the horizontal, consequently getting in the way of a pale pink fuchsia (F magellanica), which is flowering its head off at the moment, I have only been waiting for harvest festival to start rampaging round the coloneaster. The hranches will help decorate the

Removing big things, such as trees and shrubs, has the most immediate impact, of course, but sorting out the perennial understorey is no less important. Two things have happened to the detriment of the display on the bank. I have been far 100 easy-going about self-seeders such as alchemilla, brunnera and origanum, and I have let some plants, such as Iris sibirica 'Heavenly Blue', go on expanding until the clumps are at least 5ft across. No. I put that badly. No guilt. These plants deserve everything that is

Good news for red squirrels and other nut lovers: the moist, succulent Kentish cob is making a comeback, as Malcolm Smith discovers.

Darell Thompson-Schwab is a self-confessed nut freak. Each year, around this time, he takes delivery of up to 35 bags - each weighing half-a-hundredweight of rather special hazelmuts, delivered by lorry to his home near Carlisle from distant Tonbridge in Kent.

Mr Thompson-Schwab, his family and the red squirrels to which he feeds most of the nuts, are part of a culinary and ecological renaissance, because the Kentish cobnut - a superior, cultivated form of hazelnut grown since Tudor times in small plantations known as plats - is undergoing a revival in its fortunes. Victorians went nnts for a Kent cob. Harvested in autumn, they are renowned for retaining their freshness and were traditionally eaten before a meal, or afterwards with a glass of port.

But the Kent cob has long been in decline. Dr Meg Game, an ecologist and member of the Kentish Cobnuts Association, reckons that there were at least 7,000 acres of plats at the turn old shade-bearing trees provide of the century. "Only around 250 acres survive, mainly in bells, wood sorrel, orchids, even colour, "Each plat was then the Kentish Weald, but some in Gloucestershire, Worcester- depending on the underlying shire and Somerset. John Cannon also talks about improved libido, if not in his human consumers, then in the red squirrels fed with the nuts. Though Darell Thompson-Schwah can't confirm that his squirrels are more randy, in his tests with imported hazels and Kent cobs. 10 out of 10 red squirrels preferred the cobs.

Kent cobs have some official: support, too. The Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries' countryside stewardship scheme pays £8 a tree to bring derelict cobnuts back into shape, plus £100 | per acre for 10 years after planting Kent County Council will pay 30 per cent of the costs of establishing a new plat if it is near existing ones. As a result of the renaissance in interest, helped perhaps by this financial support, several fruit growers are establishing cobnut plats.

Today's nutters, as they savour the fresh white kernels of Kentish cobs, are not only preserving a culinary delicacy: they are reviving a Tudor tradition - as well as conserving a rare landscape feature.

This weekend, more than 90 countries are taking part in World Birdwatch 1997. But will the birds co-operate, or strike back?

Not often is one physically assaulted by a hird. Farmyard cockerels do sometimes spar up at humans, it is true, but for a wild hird to launch an attack is rare indeed. Yet earlier this year I found myself locked in single comhat with a rogue capercaillie.

We were driving through a pine forest when my guide let fall that we had just entered the territory of a male caper, which, crazed by sex, was driving all comers off his beat. The moment we stopped, out he strutted, down a bank, and wham! - beak-first into the front of the Land Rover. A colossal grouse, more than 2ft tall, he was nearly black in the body, with hints of brown, bottle

When I got out and tried to chat him up, he came straight for me, pecking at my legs, and when I put the toe of one boot on his hreast, to push him away, he let fly an incredibly swift double clap with his wings - bahboml - striking furiously on either side of my right knee.

So consumed with aggression was he that no amount of shooing could drive him off. I feit sure that if I had seized him by the neck and whirled him hard, an expert at the RSPB, round, he would have come many addicts develop an inback into the attack the instant he regained his feet. In the end we reboarded our Land Rover, nudged him out of the way and drove off.

I mention the incident now because today and tomorrow World Birdwatch 1997 - the biggest twitchers' turn-out in history - is taking place. The event had its origins in Birdwatch UK, during the Eighties; the idea spread to Europe, and then in 1993 went global. This year more than 90 countries are taking part, including China, Bolivia and Yemen, and it is hoped that in Britain alone at least 50,000 fans will be out there seeing what they can

The whole jamboree is coordinated by Birdlife Intercational, of which the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds is the UK partner, and the aim of this "global celehration", besides giving innocent pleasure, is to raise awareness of the need for conservation work.

For me, the idea of joining an organised group to watch hirds is terest in hirds as children, and carry the hobby on into adulthood. "First they see a challenge in identifying as many species as possible, by looks or voice. They keep lists, and get into friendly riboy. Rare old hird that. Takes valry with others about the number they've seen in a a hit of seeing. year." Anyone who claims a Bird and animal droppings, though superficially unattractive, are a rewarding subject for study, because they betray the presence of creatures rarely on view. White splashes on a stile or gatepost, for instance, are probably those of a tawny owl or a little owl, the whiteness being dissolved calcium from the bones of rodents which the nocturnal predators have caught and eaten.

Foxes often leave their calling-cards on molehills or stumps, and at this time of year the droppings are often dark red or purple - not a sign that Reynard has intestinal problems, but a reflection of his liking for fruit. Blackberries and elderberries go down well.

Experts can tell those of bucks and does apart, and some people claim that in dense forests dung-counts are the most accurate means of assessing the

Ken Morse, 53, Rostrum Сатегатал.

When I was little, I used to play with film projectors. I'd huv them, make them work. and then a friend and 1 set up a cinema in a garage, which was the start of where I am now.

I actually ran the projector at the Bristol Ritz when 1 was 12, so you can imagine I was very young then. That was my game and they couldn't keep me away. It was a proper cinema, and I had keys to get in and everything. 1 worked there for about ten vears.

Four o'clock from school, I was straight in, opening up, getting ready. We did two shows on weekdays, and on Saturday mornings there was the matinee. Then we'd open again in the afternoon an go right through to eleven. On my days off, I went to visit other cinemas, just to keep

In those days there were Mods and Rockers, and if the film was a hit boringthey'd start up their own hit of trouble or set fire to the seats.

We'd have to stop the film, get the lights on and call the police. You did wonder if they'd come in to watch a film or to fight. Being only 12 years old, I wasn't allowed to watch X-films, so I'd sneak in late at night and put them on myself. 1 got caught once. I'd left the door open, and two policemen cam in. 1 was up in the balcony watching a Hammer Horror film one of the Dracula ones where they put the stake in and everything. 1 had the music up quite loud, and 1 was absolutely petrified when two gaunt figures suddenly loomer out of the darkness.

1 didn't get into trouble; they just wanted to know what I was doing there.

South ended in the wrong slam on this deal and failed to recover. Mind you, in order to do so he would have needed considerable foresight despite the winning play being one that could never cost and might conceivably gain..

This was the (unopposed) hidding: $1 \diamondsuit - 1 \spadesuit$; $2 \spadesuit - 2 \heartsuit$; $3 \text{NT} - 5 \heartsuit$; $5 \spadesuit - 6 \spadesuit$. Clearly somebody should have hid Six No-trumps but perhaps South was keen to claim his 100 for honours. West led the ace of clubs against Six Spades and switched to a heart. Declarer won on the table and led +9 to the 3, 4 and 8. It was hard to foresee the consequences but South had already made his mistake. From this point, he was unable to reduce his trumps sufficiently to match East's length and still get the lead to dummy. At the end he had to lose a trick to East's king of spades.

South could have made his slam if he had unblocked with ♠7 under dummy's nine on the first round of trumps. He follows with the six from dummy and the difference is that this holds the trick, leaving the lead on the table. Next he ruffs a club, returns to VA, and ruffs another club. Finally he gets back to dummy by overtaking Q. South now has the same number of trumps as East and simply leads winners from dummy until East chooses to ruff.

How did you learn to play backgammon? On a holiday in Greece or Turkey to pass those idle hours on the beach? On a night shift as a bored computer operator with not enough to do? Taught by your spouse/partner to wean you away from chess or bridge? In a pub in the late Seventies as the hackgammon craze took hold of the nation, and you didn't want to feel left out?

I was taught by my girlfriend, now wife. Gill in her desperate attempt to stop me playing chess. Little did she know! What all the above have in common is that very few of us were taught as children. Yet childhood is precisely when when we should learn to play, and if we cannot change our own education, then we can at least pass on our knowledge to our children.

Backgammon, like chess, hridge and other games, is something children can grasp quite easily at an early age. As an adult I learnt the game by studying whatever literature was available - minimal, in the Seventies and playing for countless hours with like-minded individuals. You could call it trial and error. The learning curve was long and arduous as I had to sift the good from the bad and then remember the good - no mean feat for an adult, even one of only 25 summers.

Children, however, don't learn the same way and if well taught at an early age the learning curve is much steeper. They also have the huge benefit of not learning too many bad habits, if well taught initially. I have recently started to teach my daughter Katherine. 9, to play. We started with non-contact racing positions to give her the feel for moving the men, and then moved on to the normal game, played without the doubling cube. She will make a move and then ask my advice. I will try to point her in the right direction if she has made a bad mistake, and explain the basic concepts behind my reasoning. I have been amazed at the speed of her learning and her ability to retain knowledge. Once she has mastered more of the basics I will gradually introduce the concept of doubling. When I have not been around she has been practising against the computer program Jellyfish on its most basic level.

I have recently noticed that a number of friends' children have started to play. This must be good for the game and I wouldn't be surprised to see a resurgence of the game over the next few years. All we need is tournament organisers to include a children's section and we could have a British World Champion in the not too distant future. So please - let the children play.

The qualifications for a course on sculpting are a willingness to have fun Tand to experiment. There's no such thing as right or wrong, as Sally Stoples found out from a group of chiselling,

Maggie Ward, dressed up in aproo, goggles and mask, is hacking furiously at a concrete block. So far it bears little resemblance to the delicate clay model of a classical girl's head that she made last week. But these are early days io the sculpture course, and Maggie's section of people I would neventhusiasm with her hammer and chisel is promising.

"Aphrodite, here I come," she giggles as she tackles her block with gusto. "I must say that if you've had a row at home, this is good therapy." Maggie decided to sign up for the sculpture course oow that the two youogest of her three children have started university. "My husband has just retired and so I thought I would do something for me. Divided countries with a single obsession

The first cricket tour this decade by India to Pakistan ended on Thursday. It was business as usual, with stones being thrown at the visiting fielders, but the fact they play at all is a sporting miracle.

If the mood that hovers over matches between India and Pakistan is unique in cricket, it is not surprising. On Tuesday the two sides met in a one-day international in Karachi and India stole an improbable victory from the jaws of defeat. On Thursday they met again in Labore and the pitch to force the abandonopeners Ijaz Shahid Afridi smashed the Indian attack all over the ground to win an emphatic victory.

artillery shells killed 18 Indian teams played in Bradford, rival civilians in the town of Kargii in Kashmir, and the Indian retaliation was claimed by Islamabad to have killed 20 civilians in Pakistan. That they manage to play cricket at all is little short of miraculous.

The relationship between the two countries is perennially bitter, bloody and fractious. Since gaining independence 50 years ago they have fought three full-blown wars and the struggle over Kashmir grinds on year anci year. Even their clocks are at war, India's being half an hour behind Pakistan's so they do not have to celebrate Independence (which was declared at midnight) on the same day.

Cricket is the obsessional game of hoth countries, completely overshadowing all others (with the partial and arguable exception of hockey) state, they don't drink at all, and many of the fixtures down

The series that finished on Thursday was the first time in eight years that India have toured Pakistan. In that time Pakistan have twice cancelled tours of India, once in protest at the demolition of the Babri Masjid mosque, once after the nitch at Bombay was dug up.

In the game in Karachi on Tuesday, Sachin Tendulkar, the Indian captain, took his side off the field after stones were thrown. Batsmen who treat the home bowling too contemptuously have been pelted, players have been manhandled. During India's last tour of Pakistan in 1989, spectators invaded the ment of a game

The expectation, then, is that there will be fireworks - so the only time I have seen the teams playing here, at Hyderabad in June, I was taken aback by the mild, studious, goodhumoured atmosphere. SPORT ON THE INTERNET Sailing the world on the web

For the ultimate armchair adventurer, there is a web site devoted to the Whitbread Round The World Yacht Race. There are actually people who pay to go on trips like this, but now. for virtually free, you can follow the progress of all 10 competitors on a daily

The leader board shows which boat is in the lead (currently the Norwegian entry, Innovation Kvaerner), its position (just past the Cape Verde Islands) and the relative positions of the other vachts.

I'm a trifle worried that Chessie Racing seems to be amphibious as its plotted path takes it right over . the middle of one of the islands. This could prove a useful attribute for the odd short-cut later on. . Some aspects of the site are still under construction, including an active race viewer, a virtual. yacht-kacing game and a chronicle which promis video and audio links. There are diagrams of each leg with the tactics likely to be employed, information on the race rules, the scoring system, handicaps and ratings and details of the W60 yachts, which are being sailed by all the competitors. There are also pieces on all the teams and crews.

Several of the com! petitors have their own site. America's Challenge's site has a brief history of the previous six Whitbread races, diagrams and technical specifications of Heir boat, pen-pictures of all its crew plus the facility, should you wish, to e-mail any of them.

The Dutch boat Brunel. Sunergy have a site owhich they're getting philosophical - probably because they're almost Weather buffs can also have a good time with links to various meteorological sites. The Empe pean Centre for Medium Range Weather Forecas is for those who can te enough of Michael Fis and friends, with charts fi six days ahead for Northern and Son hemispheres.

GRANT DALTON

The skipper of Merit Cup in the Whitbread Round the World Race describes how he is trying to evade the slow power drain of the Doldrums.

Doldrums but right now we are going faster than at any time since we left Southampton. If anyone is going any quicker they must have picked up a jet engine along the way.

With just over a third of the distance completed to Cape Town it is far too early to indulge in any feeling of confidence, and I have never been lucky going through the Doldrums. They never deal an even hand. I wouldn't mind a change of luck.

But it is nice to know that Paul Cayard, third in EF Language and doing a whole lot better than many predicted, thinks that we and the man we are chasing, Knut Frostad in Kvaemer, have spotted the longest leg.

Just ahead lies the lottery of the right place to cross the Doldrums.

He thinks we may speak through and then pull right away and I hope he is right. We are now in that what is called the Inter-Tropical Convergence Zone. The huffers which move around and behave like a concertina, first spreading then contracting north-south, are you are a second behind or a this weekend's test of nerves.

What has struck us bard is that, if this were any of the previous races, where the winner was decided on the accumulated time taken to sail the whole way round, then a couple of the much-fancied boats could be in deep trouble, even though there is still a long way to go on this, the first and

Chris Dickson started as is that Kvaerner is going well inginto it and the rest will come race favourite but under the old system he could be looking at kissing it goodbye right now, along with Gunnar Krantz in Swedish Match. Even Lawrie Smith's Silk Cut crew would have to be deeply worried. But, instead, there is a points system for each leg, so whether day, the loss remains the same. That may be better for the whole race, but there is also the thought that this leg accounts for just less than a quarter of the whole distance but only one eighth of the points. Another thing to think about is that, so far, perhaps it is the two best hits of navigation that has decided the leaders. Our up-beat reading of that but we have been able to match piling up behind us. But if it shape, though there are the her. Where we may trade a mile or two, many others have consistently fallen back.

So, that may mean we are going quite quickly or it may all be down to luck with the wind and so far we have not had the sort of deep downwind running conditions which we like and had in the Fastnet race in August. Most of the spinnaker work has been quite tight. which is not best for us. And we are profiting from what I think were serious blunders by a couple of navigators. You have to get west, guys. Still, it is the Doldrums which could throw the curved ball. If the ITCZ is moving south then we will keep bump- it is barely enough.

moves north we will be through and away. At least we have some relatively clean clothes again. On day 12 we ceremonially changed everything and threw the old shorts and tee-shirts, suitably weighted of course, over the side. They weren't the sort of things you would want to keep on board. They could jump up and grah you.

What has not improved is the food. In earlier races you took as much fresh food as possible before breaking into the freezedried stuff. Now eating is hard yakka all the way. We have enough for 33 days and that was supposed to be too much. Now downs, as well as the ups, when we see if we have lost any miles at the six-hourly position updates we receive for the whole fleet. They know it is still early days. There is no risk of complacency as we follow the routine of sleep, eat and sail. It's just husiness. We are winning on one hand, but only holding on with the other. I don't like having a boat nearly 30 miles ahead of me.

IY 3U miles ahead of me.

Spectators at Valderrama used every vantage point available to follow the Ryder Cup. The more adventurous took to the trees, while some of those who found their line of sight obstructed attempted to view the action through periscopes (below). A privileged few, however, including the players' wives (bottom right), enjoyed the luxury of watching from inside the ropes. Away from the course, accommodation was in such short supply that some fans had to take to the water. One special deal offered accommodation on a luxury yacht (below left, viewed from the course), dinner and entrance to Valderrama. The cost? A mere £2,000 per day.

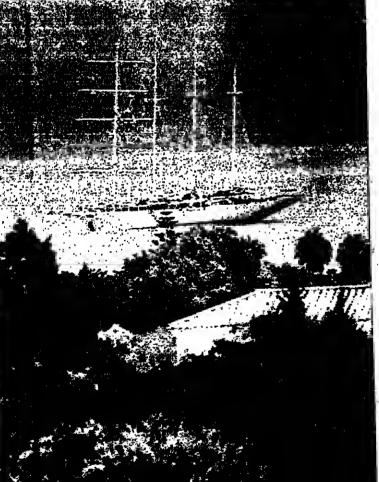

Valderrama: veni, vidi, vici

The intimate atmosphere of last weekend's Ryder Cup at Valderrama - where a respectful but excited gallery rubbed shoulders with golf's richest and best from Europe and the United States - contributed to a special event. Andy Forrell mingled with a crowd worthy of the occasion.

It was almost like being Seve Ballesteros, being a spectator at Valderrama. OK, you didn't get to zip around the course on his Thrust-style buggy. You couldn't get inside the ropes to pull a club out of a bag and quietly (?!) suggest to a caddie this was the implement he should hand to his player.

But, like Seve, you didn't get any sleep. Like Seve, you got soaking wet. And, like Seve, you all but played every shot and went through every possible emotion before Europe secured the narrowest of victories. They came from all over Europe, mainly from Britain and Ireland but also from Germany and Scandinavia in their Viking helmets - and from Italy and France, and even some from other parts of Spain.

From the resorts of Marbella and Torremolinos, they rose at 4am to travel to the western end of the Costa del Sol. Strictly against orders, they smuggled in step ladders and stole crates from the catering tents to see the action.

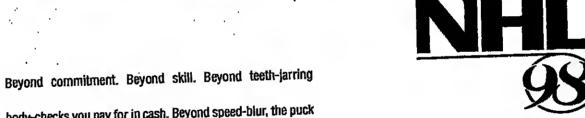

There were more Americans than ever before for a Ryder Cup on this side of the Atlantic, although you would not have known it on the first two days. Only on Sunday, with the Stars and Stripes comeback operational, did they reach their usual volubility.

Since the excesses of Kiawah Island, with the American players whipping up a partisan gallery, decorum has been re-established. It started four years ago at The Belfry, where some Americans had cause to complain on previous occasions, and especially at Oak Hill in '95. Despite the fact that spectators can get closer to the action than in any other sport, and the closeness of the contest, there were no major incidents at Valderrama.

The atmosphere was incredible, the tension was amazing," said a newcomer to the event. "The whole thing went far beyond my expectations. There was a complete feeling of unity for the Europeans. It didn't matter who it was, where they were from, everyone ganged up behind them.

"You can get so close to the players when you are by the ropes. You could shout 'well done' or 'good luck and they would acknowledge the support. Even Seve, rushing around on his buggy, stopped to give autographs. But best of all was the respect everyone had for the players and the occasion. The silence at each relevant moment was electrifying."

The visiting captain, Tom Kite, had no complaints. "I cannot say enough about the galleries," he said. They were enthusiastic but at the same time very fair. They were quiet when my players were playing, they were courteous of all my players. They cheered louder for the Europeans, but we expected that. In two years' time it will be the other way round."

The best medicine for our best friends

If you are one of those lucky people whase life has been enriched by the company of animals, pleuse consider giving them something back by making a donation or including The Animal Health Trust in your will.

The Trust, whose Patron is HM The Queen, is leading the way in improving the medical welfare of our favourite animals - our horses, dogs and cats.

We are truly an international centre of excellence, with some 180 staff, including highly qualified veterinarians and medical scientists, many of whom are world leaders in their particular specialities. All are committed to the relief of animal suffering and distress caused by disease or injury by means of organised. methodical and scientific action. This has resulted in leading edge surgical techniques, saving animals which until recently would have been destroyed, and the development of the original vaccines for canine distemper and

The Trust relies heavity on charitable donations, particularly legacies. As well as being extremely tax efficient for the donor, legacies make it possible for us to plan vital longer term programmes more effectively.

Your donation and legacy will enable us to further develop our knowledge and experience. helping future generations of animals to lead healthier, more contented lives - to the continuing delight of their owners.

When My Emma lines up for Europe's richest horse-race, tomorrow's Prix de l'Arc de riomphe, it will be the culmination of a twoyear plan and a long-held dream for one of Newmarket's less celebrated trainers, Rae Guest

Rae Guest heard My Emma had fallen over while he was away in Ireland. The words flip and fiddlesticks did not go through his mind. "But it was something beginning with eff." he said.

With a formight to go before the Prix de l'Arc de Triomphe and near the culmination of a two-year strategy this was not the greatest news the Newmarket trainer could have received. He returned immediately for a bedside vigil. "As soon as I heard she'd slipped up the first thing I wanted to do was get back," he said. "It wasn't as if I could do anything, but I had to get back.

"It was the biggest blow that I, the owner and everyone in the yard could get. We've been planning this for two years. It wasn't as if anyone had died, but it was the next worst thing for all of us."

It has not been quite time for dark clothes and a passage from Auden, however. A patched-up My Emma has again been sighted on the training grounds at Headquarters she will demonstrate her this week and tomorrow abilities in the Bois de Boulogne. If good guys do indeed finish last, the filly will be tailed off, though the form book does not promote that likelihood.

Rae Guest is the most understated of Newmarket's many trainers. In fact it is hard to believe he is a trainer at all sometimes. He exudes neither an air of great supremacy nor she would one day win an Arc. a suggestion that his job is what keeps the globe spinning nn its axis. But he does know what he is talking about.

In racing, there are enough Guests to fill a marquee and Rae comes from a line that includes his brother, Richard. winner of a Champion Hurdle and uncles Nelson, a trainer, and Joe. The latter is remembered for the impressions he left at jumping racetracks, both on his audiences and in the terrain. They called him either the Iron Man or the India Rubber Man. Rae Guest himself was a rider of some aplomb both here and in Denmark, compiling 600 career winners, the most notable of them as an aide-decamp of Luca Cumani. He was at the controls on Tolomeo when the colt was third to Teenoso and Sadler's Wells in a King George, and he was the gallops tutnr of good horses such as Bairn and Half A Year. Nathing though prepared him for the exhibaration of morning manoeuvres on My Emma. "If you've worked horses all your life you should know when one is a little bit better than the rest," he said. "My Emma is the best horse I've been on. Even Tolomeo and horses like that would struggle to beat her." By the time he left the weighing room for the last time Guest had purchased Chestnut Tree Stables, which is hidden in Newmarket's versino of the Lost Valley. At the bottom of the yard you can count 25 horses, but the unly one that counts is My Emma. Guest understood that she was an uncommonly useful filly soon after she arrived in his keeping but it took some time to prove it. As a three-year-nld My Emma developed an internal nasal obstacle, while a similar protuberance on the outside leot her the impression of an equine Karl Malden. "She gnt this cyst, what they call a polyp, oo her nose," Guest said. "That had to come off."

By the time the nurses had

waved My Emma farewell the Classics had come and gone. The filly won her maiden at Newmarket, after which Guest said Those within earshot waited for an orderly with a butterfly net to Tuesday when My Emma take him to a secure institution.

There was not so much sniggering though when My Emina was sent on a foray to France for the Prix Vermeille. She woo and the historical precedents of All Along, Ivanjica and Aliez France - all nf whom won the Arc the year after success in the Vermeille - were produced. This season's programme included another Group One success, in the Yorkshire Oaks, work rider, Paul Tulk, set off Back on the gallops this week, My Emma works her way back to fitness for her greatest test in tomorrow's Prix de l'Arc de Triomphe and the march seemed relentless. Then came Black Suoday. "If anything goes wrong with her it's always because she's caused it herself," Guest said.

than the rest of them she always has energy left over. And wherever it's most slippery she seems able to jump on to that spot. "That morning she was just too well in herself and she slipped just after she came out of her box. When she got back from her gal-

"Because she's that much better

lop there was this great haematoma on her backside, a blood blister the size of half a football. "I suddenly felt everyone was against us, especially as she's had only two rons all year and everything has been planned. It was a bitter blow." emerged to continue her recuperation. The filly was up before the sun and taken through light drizzle to a Conan Doyle morning on Newmarket's Watered Gallop. Among those pulling their collars fast on the trial ground were workwatchers and My Emma's owner, lan Matthews, whose daughter has lent her name to the filly.

My Emma and her usual

It was a bitter day too on Honoured Guest: Whatever happens, everyone associated with the filly is p beind Guest on a lead horse, Montecristo. The hoofbeats disappeared into the mist and when the two forms returned the order had changed and there was a considerable distance between them. Tulk reported it was the hest My Emma had ever worked. Guest was more circumspect. "She has been really stiff and sore but she worked really good," the trainer said. "She's happier within herself and by Sunday she should be 100 per cent.

"If we hadn't had this accideot we'd have gone there very confident. But a hiccup is a hiccup and you never know how much it's affected her. Whatever happens, everyone associated with the filly is proud of her."

In the run-up to Longchamp, Guest has received heaps of eoquiries about My Emma's welfare, several from people whose only connection with her is that a member of: their family bears a similar name. There have been promises to ring back with congratulations should she win the Prix de l'Arc de Triomphe. It would be nice to telephone Chestnut Tree Stables on Monday morning and find the line engaged.

FORM GUIDE Heliasto was on emphatic 5-length warner of this race on good to soft ground last year from PILSUDSIG, with Oscar Schindler a short-nose behind in third. Swalin a further length back in lourth and Le Destin another 2 lengths behind in sixth. Helisto confined that form when beating the selection by six lengths in the Prix Gardy over Im 2! at this course in the spring, but could finish only third to Swain and Pilsudover the 2'st this occurse in the spring, but could trish only thing to Swain and Plaud-sid on soft ground in the King George VI & Cueen Elizabeth Stakes at Ascot in July As Swain is at his best with plenty of give in the ground and Helissio seems to bene-tif from the careful handling that he receives from Olivier Pasiles, who rides Palmire Celebre here, the consistent Plaudst must be the selection. He looked better than ever when trouncing Desert King in the Insh Champion Stakes over fin 2's at Loop-ardshown last time and, as he showed his best form in the autumn last year, can be forgiven the Prix Ganay defeat by Helissio. Oscar Schnider came from a long way be-hind to snatch third last year and, with the same rider on board today, smillar facice hind to sneach third last year and, with the same hider on board today, sanitar factics can be expected on the colt who won the trish SI Leger over 'th 6f last time. He may need a longer trip to show his best. Peintre Cafetine has won four of his six races, including the Prix du Jockey-Culo (French Derby) (fin 4f), but has raced only against his own age group and has certainly not encountered opposition as testing as this. Le Deaths often nurs well is hop races, but has won only once and that was a minor event early last year. My Emma boasts a course-and-distance success in last year's Prix Vermeille (Good to Firm) and should acquit herself well, while the winner of this year's Vermeille, Queen Masud, is improving, holds the one-langth nurse-up Gazelle Royalle on that form, and should not be discounted. Positionals bed a below-par Swein st. Newbury recently but, at the age of five, has had his limitations exposed, wh Calco winner, Ebacilyta, and recent Doncaster scorer Busy Flight, have re enough to suggest that they are up to this. More interesting to one of the Ger lengers, Borgia, who had Predappio 2 lengths back in third when winning the Group.

One Grosser Press von Bacten (fm 4t good) leat thre. She has been supplemented for the race at a cost of £36,000. Her companiot, Que Belle, beat Borgle by 11/s lengths back in June but may not be progressing as swifty.

Selection: PILSUDSKO.

Pilsudski can take wind out of French sails

The first four home in last year's Arc may fight. out the finish again tomorrow and Richard Edmondson believes that victory this time may go to last year's Britishtrained runner-up.

It would make sense, this weekend, if the sails on the nruamental windmill sited by Longchamp racecourse turned for the very first time.

It is hard enough work in win a Prix de l'Arc de Triomphe, but this year's victorious mimal will have to fight it's way through the most insaluhrious, stagnant air ever to have descended on France's capital. They should turn on the fan.

Traffic problems have caused the high level of nitrogen dioxide in the Parisian air, and traffic problems will also have a decisive effect on an Arc contested by 18 bustling runners. It is a feature of this year's contest that it is being run against the most interesting He was let out to ride work on backcloth in Gallic racing for many years. The antiseptic world of the French turf has been contaminated by a feud between two jockeys who have both ridden last year's Arc winger, Helissio, with contrasting success.

Since a public dispute over tactical riding in a race at Longchamp last mooth, Cash Asmussen and Olivier Peslier have become the Tom and Jerry of Continental racing. Tomorrow, Peslier is contracted to ride Helissio's rival for supremacy in France, Peintre Celebre, while Asmussen has unt been selected to continue his brief association with Helissio.

Last year's winner will instead be ridden instead by Dominique Boeuf, who was himself guillotined from the horse after failing to win last year's French Derby.

Boeuf was the man who found himself incarcerated awaiting serious drug offences two years ago; misdeeds the authorities took so badly they shut Alec, 57, in bed with a 19-yearhim up in prison almost all day. old girl. Mathematicians more Alec's estranged wife, Jocelyn, has never been a great one for housework. It is said she is unable to work that hugely complicated piece of machinery in the kitchen of the family's Manhattan town house, the item they call the oven.

Dear Jocelyn is reported to travel on the Wildenstein jet (with its horseshoe logo on the tailfin) accompanied by her pet monkey and five Italian greyhounds. Perhaps she has been unsettled by finding gifted than Jocelyn have calculated her husband's age as exactly three times that of the girl.

The conundrum about whether Peintre Celehre is good enough to win an Arc may therefore seem like small beer to Daniel Wildenstein tomorrow afternoon. It may well be that this beautifully bred colt once again shows the awesome acceleration to remove his owner's preoccupations.

A startling fact, however, is that despite the victories of Helissio and Lammtarra in the last two years, Peintre Celebre will he the only three-year-old colt to go to post. Either he has frightened aff all his contemporaries or they are considered to be a pretty ropey crop by their respective trainers. Either way, Peintre Celebre is worth ignoring among such a gifted bunch of older horses. It is entirely possible that this year's Arc could be virtually a re-run of 12 months ago. The first four from last season reoppose, and they include the first three from this year's King Stakes, the supposed race of the ing your French belittled by decade. So tomorrow's event cannot be too bad either. Helissin commanded his field last year, covering each furlong in 12 seconds until cranking it up at the entrance to the straight and leaving the posse behind. Subsequent efforts suggest he may be a bully of a horse and, if anything takes him on, that old head may go to one side and his challenge subside. Oscar Schindler and My Emma will certainly unt be in the vanguard early on, but their form suggests they will be finishing competitively to share the minor honours with Swain.

There can be unly une prediction for the animal to be at the head, however. Pilsudskiwas second last year and later champion of the Americas in the Breeders' Cup Turf. The signals, especially his latest effort. in the Irish Champion Stakes, hint that he is not quite ready for a roaring fire and slippers. Go to your maximum.

British success in the Prix de l'Abbaye used to be as integral George VI & Queen Elizabeth a part of the weekend as havwaiters on the Parisian boulevards. However, Kistena led bome a 1-2 for Criquette Head 12 months ago and the filly is again in the field. Royal Applause, who tonk the Haydock Park Sprint Cup for Barry Hills, seems to be a more potent performer this year and he will need to be.

In tomorrow's nther Group One, the Prix Marcel Boussac, Ashraakat must go well if she is to maintain her elevated position in the 1998 1,000 Guineas ante-post market. But then she probably will as John Dunlup chooses to plonk only his best fillies in this contest.

This afternoon there are British runners spattered across the card at Longchamp, but the two old faithfuls are undoubtedly features of the Prix du Cadran. A few sentimental francs will be placed on Celeric and Double Trigger, who not only have to survive the hume challenge but also the Republic's filthy air being pumped into their lungs for the best part of four and a half minutes.

NEWMARKET Klimanjaro also trotted up that day and was only fourth in the Royal Lodge – but she still looked a special act to my eyes. Kool Kat Katie returned lame after her impressive debut win with Otivier Pesiler at Newbury in April, Again with Pesiler, she was good enough to gain a cheeky win in a Lated race at Desuville (tin) in August and her dam won over this longer stp. Keel Ket Ketie could still be anything and has a top replacement in Ray Cochrana. Dust Duncer is a lough coolde who is best at this trp. Deallowed is a confirmed front-runner who gets two and a half miles and she should test the fitness of some of these to the full with that run behind her. Her only unplaced effort in six attempts was when seventh behind Summer Spell at Kempton in January, for which she is allowed a very generous 20th. That was an impressive performance from Summer Spell and he had previous winner Fair Dawn (3to better in) atmost nine lentitle back in foorth. He continued to run well after that but Fair Dawn got his own back when runner-up to Cusivers Field at Aintree (Summer Spell six lengths back in fourth at levels). While there's little to choose between these two useful performant, the fact that neither has had a recent run puts the ball in Disallowed's court. PUNTERS' GUIDE

CHEPSTOW 2.05: Richard Dunwoody has been schooling CRACK ON over fences at Philip Hobbs' Somerset yard and is fit enough and good enough to leave today's modest rivals toiling.

2.40: Crandon Boulevard has been primed for this race with a outing st Worcester last month. However, FAR DAWN won first time out last season, is from a stable in form and has the class to defy top-weight.

3.10: David Bridgwater, injured since last April, can make a successful return on SAMLEE. This eight-year-old has plenty of ability, though he will need to treat these tough fences with respect.

NEWMARKET 2.55: Dick Hern could have run and take on the Oaks winner advantaged.

Pasternak's trainer Siz Mark Prescott had insisted that the leading cootender would only take his chance if there was significant rain. The wet weather has not arrived at Newmarket but Pasternak was, nevertheless, among the 36 horses standing their ground for the nine-furlong handicap.

The horse will run. We would like rain but we are notgoing to get it." said Prescott.

With the doubts over his running removed Pasternak, a winner of the Magnet Cup on his last outing, is now the clear. specify, the bet will be settled favourite in most bookmakers' at PMU odds. Side with St John in battle with bookies

The Cambridgeshire is one of the year's most tempting handlcaps for punters and the statistics show that it can often be solved too. Greg Wood, who on the last two Saturdays has selected the I4-I winner of the Ayr Gold Cup and the 9-1 winner of the Queen Elizabeth II Stakes, picks an improving youngster to continue his winning sequence

It is very difficult to be a punter this morning and not feel a little intimidated. There are plenty of valuable handicaps spread throughout the Flat season which poke you in the ribs and dare you to take them on if you think you're tough enough, but none of them is quite so inyour-face about it as the Cambridgeshire. Just about the largest field of the year, many prepared throughout the campaign with just this race in mind, belting down nine furlongs of Newmarket Heath this is a challenge that few can refuse, even when they know that they are likely to get burt.

The first essential, of course, is not to let it know that you are afraid. In all, 36 runners will enter the stalls just after 3.30 this afternoon, but you can look this field in the eye without hlinking and overlook at least a dozen which are clearly carrying too much weight or have lost their form. Next, study the statistics, which reveal that, with the exception of Balthus's victory at 50-1 a decade ago, the Cambridgeshire is not the wild lottery which the number of runners might suggest. Four of the last seven winners were returned at single-figure odds, while the other three came home at 10-1, 11-1 and 14-1. prices which in an average year are almost nudging favouritism.

Among the likely favourites this afternoon is Hunters Of Brora, who finished second in the race three years ago, a magnificent effort in view of the fact that Halling, the winner, was already showing the improvement which would turn him into one of the best horses in Europe but raced off a low handicap mark of just 93.

The problem with Hunters Of Brora, though, is that whether it is a well-handicapped opponent or a wall or horses at an inopportune moment, something always seems to prevent her winning, and she has not recorded a victory for several seasons. She also seems to go best after a hreak, which is not something she has enjoyed before today's race.

The memory of Halling, though, should direct punters towards an obvious source of progressive horses who may still be ahead of the handicapper.

Three-year-olds have a good record in the Cambridgeshire, and three in particular appeal as possibilities today. Prince Of Denial showed an excellent turn of foot to win at Newbury two weeks ago and is fairly priced at 12-1, while Rudimental is aalso tempting at 20-1 with Coral and the Tote. A better bet than both, however, may be SILK ST JOHN (nap 3.35). A 33-1 chance with those same two firms this morning, Mick Ryan's runner was just touched off by Yalta at Kempton recently in a race run in an excellent time. The mere reproduction of that form would take him very close today, and there could well be improvement still to come.

worst bet in Britain, and also the most popular. Any bookic who tried to pay out at 66-1 when one of his punters had found a 1,000-1 treble would risk instant gelding, yet this is what the National Lottery gets away with twice a week. And while a bookmaker will generally be pleased to make a profit of about 3 per cent on turnover, Camelot takes 5p in every pound you stake, which is not a bad reward for running a low-overhead, riskfree monopoly. As for your chances of winning, an illuminating (if fairly roughand-ready) calculation is that if you buy a Lottery ticket on Monday morning, you are almost 3,000 times more likely to die before 8pm the following Saturday night than you are to hit the jackpot. If your luck is really out, of course, you will do both.

Certainty: "Something established as inevitable", according to the dictionary, unless prefaced by the word "racing", in which case it is anything but. The list of horses which allegedly had only to maintain a pulse for the duration of a race in order to win is a long one, and includes hotshots beaten at Royal Ascot at such short odds that aristos with more green than grey managed to lose a fortune while simply trying to make enough money to op the cabhie taking them home. The story is also told of the punter in the 1940s who believed he had come up with a brilliant winning system, and instructed his bookie that he wanted to ket, trying to score a line. back Gordon Richards's most fancied mount each day to win £1,000. The Classic-winning trainer George Lambton, in Men And Horses I Have Known, recalls that in 1903, "one constantly saw horses who were notorious rogues running and winning as if they were possessed of the devil, with eyes starting out of their heads and the sweat pouring off them". In order to demonstrate to the Jockey Club that the practice should be banned. Lambton took the imaginative step of doping some of his own runners, administering five doses to horses with no worthwhile form. The results were four winners and a second, enough to convince Lamhton's well-connected friends of the dangers of drugs. Their use was banned by the Jockey Club shortly afterwards, forcing gangs of agitated thoroughhreds to hang around street corners in the seedier end of Newmar-

Some Picture gets his shot at immortality No greyhound has ever and so will be chasing not just run. The beauty of this dog is hound's racing career is short, a fake hare, but an unprecethat he runs the first and sec- and with nothing left to prove won the Triple Crown of English, Scottish and Irish Derbys, but Some Picture could complete the treble in Dublin tonight before setting out on a stud career that should earn his owner a million. Greg Wood finds out what makes this dog so special.

He is young, gifted and hlack. He has earned almost £250,000 in the last 18 months and is reckoned the finest athlete his sport has seen for at least 60 years. If he had feet, he would not slip one into a top-hrand training shoe for less than half a million a year.

But he does not. He has four paws, which in the space of 30 seconds at Shelbourne Park in Duhlin tonight could carry him into greyhound history. Some Picture will leave trap five at 10 o'clock to race around four bends in the final of the Irish Derby, and victory would make him the first dog ever to win both the English and Irish Derbys in the same season. Not only that, Some Picture also won the Scottish Derby earlier this year, dented Triple Crown of the most competitive greyhound races in the British Isles.

Until Some Picture started his Classic collection, few in the sport believed that a greyhound Triple Crown was any more achievable than a Grand Slam in golf. A measure of the scepticism is the £100,000 bonus put up by Imperial Tobacco, sponsors of the Scottish Derby, the opening leg, for any dog who could go on to complete the set. They did not, you suspect, even consider the possibility that they might have to pay up.

And their money looked safe a little over a week ago when, after passing untrouhied through the first three qualifying rounds at Shelbourne, Some Picture finished only second in his quarter-final, running as if he had just smoked 20 Players. He was beaten again in the semi-finals three days later, hut as Steve Spiteri, his owner, explams, Some Picture was running on nothing more than courage.

"He'd picked up a stomach bug and he just wasn't himself," Spiteri says. We were very close to withdrawing him, but he seemed to perk up before the quarter-final so we let him ond bends really hard and then flies down the back straight, but in the quarter-final that kick just wasn't there."

Some Picture will have had a week to recover from his semi-final by the time the traps snap open tonight. "If he clears the bend," Spiteri says, "he will take all the beating. He doesn't have to turn [the first bend] in front to win. He can turn third or fourth so long as he gets a clear run, and then he just explodes, the pace is unreal. He's so special, if you see him standing he's a fantastic looking dog, he looks like a statue. He's got brilliant physique, great balance and temperament, everything. And he can run." It is not just those who know and love him who slip into fluent eulogy whenever Some Picture is discussed. The previous Arkle of dog racing was Mick The Miller, who won the English Derby in both 1929 and 1930, just three years after the sport began at Belle Vue in 1926. The tracks and punters have been waiting for one like him ever since, and most now believe that their vigil is at an end.

Unlike Arkle, though, Some Picture will not be returning season after season. A greywhether he wins tonight or not, he will retire to stud immediately. There, he is expected to become the sport's first million-pound hound, with a covering fee of about £1,000 and perhaps two matings a day. "That's just off the scale," Simon Marcantonio, of the British Greyhound Racing Board, says, "most raceborses don't earn anything like that in their lifetime, and be was bought for only about £10,000. He is greyhound racing's Nijinsky, and in many ways his success has made the sport a lot more buoyant and optimistic. It had been in decline, but now we've walked into a higstory." History is not made easily in any sport, however, and Some Picture is far from a long oddson chance to win his last race. Spiral Nikita - "the talk of Ireland for the last two years and one of the fastest dogs ever to Some Picture: Some dog travel the back straight at Shelbourne Park," according to Spiteri - is drawn just inside Some. Picture in trap four, while Vintage Prince (three) and Toms The Best (six) are also sure contenders. Ladbrokes make Some Picture a slight favourite

"The ground was also softer and I should think he is better on faster ground - he is a very good mover."

Haami holds an entry in the Group One Dewhurst hack at Newmarket in a fortnight, but is a doubtful runner, according to Dunlop. "I wouldn't think he would run again," he added. "Ask Sheikh Hamdan and see what he says. I might say he would run in the Dewburst but I think he might disagree

No reverse gear for Healey, Leicester's motor mouth

The Leicester Lip is back in overdrive after a disconcertingly quiet summer. Chris Hewett tries and fails to get a word in edgeways as a rejuvenated Austin Healey lifts the lid on life with the Tigers and offers a few considered opinions on the French. the All Blacks and just about everyone else.

Austin Healey is describing the warm, intimate, close-knit team spirit that makes Leicester the most crivied club in English rugby. "Half the things we do in training are geared towards us kicking the crap out of each other. We're always at it. I was fighting with Richard Cockerill only last Monday, I quite enjoyed it. actually, although he's still in a strop for some strange reason. I don't know why. It was par for the course.

Perhaps Cockerill, the Tigers' hooker who won his first England cap in Argentina during the summer, will continue to brood until he gets even with his infuriatingly uppity clubmate. In which case, he faces a frustrating wait at the back of a very long queue. Healey dedicates more time to perfecting the art of the wind-up than any player since Brian Moore and, as a result, the rugby population is divided into two halves: those who plan to punch his lights out and those who have already tried. His conversation mirrors his rughy almost exactly: it comes in rapid, staccato bursts, driven by a rich humour flecked with a mocking derision for those he considers deserving of nothing better. He is not so much super-confident as supraconfident, his self-belief bordering on the obsessive, his ambition limitless. If Healey ever achieves the standards he has set for himself, he will be Gareth Edwards and David Loveridge ralled into one.

ting, he will this afternoon face Toulouse in a hugely significant Heineken Cup match for the third time in 10 months. Typically, he has an opinion on the subject. "It's time for them to put up or shut up, isn't it? We've played them twice and beaten them twice. They've got a big reputation but they haven't done much away from home and if we play well, we'll beat them again. Nothing more "Psychologically, we've got it over them, haven't we? They might come to Welford Road with an unbelievable drive to hury this bogey team thing, but when they look up after 10 minutes and see we've got points on the board, the old doubts will be there again, Mind you, I can't help thinking that if they stopped giving away all the stupid penalties they concede every game, stopped all the gouging and hiting and fighting that goes on with the French, they'd find it more difficult to lose than to win. They'd be marvellous, you know. They're really very gifted.

"To my mind, the French aren't taking the game as professionally as they should. The same goes for the Welsh. If someone punches you and it doesn't hurt too much, what earthly point is there in punching them back? All you achieve is a reversed penalty, miles of lost ground and, if you end up being cited, a lost wage packet into the hargain." As we are on the subject of book on last summer's Lions tour, Jeremy Guscott claims "Scally the Scouse" would do anything for cash. Any truth in that one, Austin? "I'll tell you one thing I'd never do for Shoulder problems permitmoney," he says. "I would never, ever [long pause] read a hook by Jerry Guscott. "Let's face it, though. This is a pro game now and if you don't want to be fined, you don't turn up late for training. The old amateur ethos has gone for good and quite frankly, I don't want to retire from rugby, move into a council house and live on bread and water. I dearly want to play for England, not only to satisfy myself but because you get loads of money for it. I'd play for free if I had to because the prestige means more than anything else. But let's not pretend the money isn't worth having."

Healey's Test place is by no means secure, even though he finished last season's Five Nations' Championship chirping happily away at the heels of the England pack. A dodgy game in six feet of East London mud last May badly undermined his Lions campaign and, when he Cook Cup match with Australia, he lost out to his friend and rival, Matt Dawson.

"I could have performed better in East London, definitely, although the people who expected miracles from me in South Africa were basing those expectations on hard grounds and perfect playing conditions. I thought I played well enough to make the side for the opening Test with the Boks, but the selectors obviously didn't agree. I was more upset about Australia, really, but the setback motivated me, I got into my

The England set-up under Clive Woodward and the new regime is pretty relaxed, although that's probably because he hasn't named his first Test side yet. It'll be less relaxed when you have 15 very happy blokes and another 15 thoroughly pissed off with life. Still, we possess the talent to have a great season. We've gut to be looking to see off Australia at home and, while New Zealand are a different proposition, I wouldn't even consider going out on the pitch unless I knew we could beat them. Eighty per cent of their greatoess stems from the fact that the rest are scared to death of them. We need to put that sort of thinking behind us."

So you've never been fazed by anyone, Austin? Never left a dressing-room knowing full well that you are on a hiding to nothing? "Once," he admits. "When I was at Waterloo back in '93 and we'd drawn Bath in the cup. I remember thinking. 'We'll never win this in a million years, but when they turned up without Stuart Barnes and Ben Clarke I thought, 'Well, perhaps there's just a glimmer.' As the game went on, that feeling became stronger and stronger. Final-the Heineken Cup, the new holy grail for club sides the length and breadth of Europe? "Oh yes, we've gol a potential cup-winning side. Actually, I blame myself to a large degree for our defeat against Brive in ly. Guscott missed with a last season's final. If I'd tackled Sebastien Viars in the corner and stopped their opening try, it would have been a different game. Wait until I see him again. He handed me off three times and I ended up falling at his feet."

Shouldn't that he "grovelling" at his fect, Austin? You looked as though you were grovelling. "Don't be ridiculous," he snaps, the cheeky grin nowhere to be seen. I never Emile Ntamack and Christophe Devlaud, on the injury list and he knows he must beat Leicester at Welford Road this afternoon if he is to avoid a distinctly uncomfortable quarterfinal play-off match at the start of next month. How does he feel, given this litary uf woe?

"Pleased." apparently. Rather a rum attitude, especially as Toulouse have suffered two consecutive. morale-sapping Heineken Cup defeats at the hands of the Tigers this year. Indeed, the last time the Frenchmen pitched up in the east Midlands, they tried everything to get the game, last season's semi-final postponed. Even though the playing surface was more suited to Torville

Castaignède, the visitors failed miserably.

Still, Noves is very much "up" for what is effectively the Pool A decider. "Emile will play his first game of the season for a junior side tomorrow, but there is no way either he or Christophe can face Leicester," he said. "I am happy with the way we have played in this competition, however, because we have kept on improving match by match Last season's semifinal is a bad memory - they dominated us in every phase of the game - but we want to avoid the play-offs and secure home advantage in the last eight and those amhitions are a big mo-

At least neither side can go belly-up this afternoon. For Swansea, big Welsh hopes for a quarter-final place at least, victory over Glasgow at SI Helen's is critical. The Scots, galvanised by their exciting 20-year-old wing. James Craig, will send the All Whites nosediving out of the compelition if they contrive to repeat the 35-21 triumph they recorded at the Scotstoun Stadium last month. Another hot tip for a last-

Former referee to develop Five Nations

The former Scottish international referee Alan Hosie has succeeded Tom Kiernan as chairman of the Five Nations.

Kiernan will continue to be involved as a committee man with the Five Nations, the International Rugby Football Board, the Irish Rugby Union and European Rugby Cup Ltd.

Hosie, 52, refereed 22 internationals before joining the Scottish Rugby Union in 1986. He has served on the Five Nations for five years, is chairman of the Laws Committee of the IRFB and is also on the Four Home Unions Tours Commitiee. "I am keen to follow up all the good work that Tom Kiernan achieved over the years," Hosie said.

The Five Nations is still the jewel in the crown, and it is my wish and desire to make this competition even better."

Richard Jasinski, the 10th secretary of the Welsh Rugby Union and one of the guiding forces behind the Millennium Stadium project, has resigned his post and will leave the job he has occupied for the past 15 months at the end of October. The 50-year-old former

The Premier League clubs will be split into two pools of four to play a domestic round of matches before Christmas. The overseas teams will come to Wales in January to play in the second phase.

Northern Transvaal will represent South Africa; Cordoba. Rosario and Tucuman will travel from Argentina, and national sides from Canada. Spain and Namibia will also play in the tournament.

The SRU has announced that Scotland A will play Northern Transvaal at a Scottish venue on 23 January, the same weekend as the senior Scotland and Under-21 teams play Italy in Treviso. Italy were unhappy about playing a senior and A fixture on the same weekend, as had been originally scheduled.

The Scots defeated Northern Transvaal during their summer tour of southern Africa. three weeks after the South African provincial side had beaten the British Lions.

The match against Northern Transvaal will follow a short tour by another southern hemisphere Super 12 side, ACT, who will play each of the four Scottish districts between 18 November and 5 December.

Club sticks by decision to West Hardepool have stood by their decision to sack the England Under-21 prop Virgil Hardand following alleged biting incidents in matches against Rotherham and Wakefield.

West's New Zealand coach, Mike Brewer, recommended that the Second Division club terminate Hartland's two-year contract for gross misconduct.

The move has been condemned by Hartland's agent, the former England prop Mike Burton, who has threatened legal action for what he termed character assassination : The England Under-21 manager, John Elliott, also questioned West's wisdom, but the Brierton Lane executive chairman, Andy Hindle, said the club would not change its stance towards Hartland. "I have been assonished by the reaction of some senior people in the game," Hindle said. This comes at a time when foul play is in the headlines following the Brive versus Pontypridd game, and yet we are being criticised for taking action."

West, relegated last season, have strengthened their squad by signing the Italian international second-row Mark Giacheri, a Super 12 performer with New South Wales. Another newcomer, the New Zealander Emerson Nikora, makes his debut in today's Allied Dunhar Premiership Two game at Exeter. Bath and Wasps will provide almost half of England's Under-21 development squad. The 30man group includes several players the England coach, Clive Woodward, has used in senior squad sessions at Bisham Abbey this season. The former Erigland A coach. Keith Richardson, will

RUGBY LEAGUE

Oldham on the brink of extinction

One of the game's founder clubs has gone into liquidation and, as Dave Hadfield reports, it has few assets, with the ground sold and players already leaving.

Oldham, part of the game for 102 years, are oo the brink of extioction after going ioto voluntary liquidation with debts estimated at more than film.

The club, founder-members of the Rugby League in 1895, have been in financial trouble since losing their Super League status by finishing last in this year's competition.

Players have not been paid and talks with businessmen said to be interested in taking over the club have broken down. Administrative staff were made redundant yesterday.

"It is a cruel blow for the players and supporters of the Oldham club," said the League's chief executive, Maurice Lindsay. "We are particularly disappointed as only at the end of August we advanced £280,000 to assist them through the winter and to pay players' outstanding wages."

Lindsay said he had tried. without success, to speak to Jim Quinn, the club's chairman, and that the League would hold the players' registrations until they found new clubs - or until someone comes forward with a rescue package.

liquidation and lived to fight another day but Oldham's plight is acute. Their main asset, their Watersheddings ground, has already been sold and is being transformed into a housing estate, while the cost of continuing to play at Oldham Athletic's Boundary Park will be prohibitive on the modest gates that can be expected in the First Division.

Selling their more valuable players is one potential source of relicf but those players were already claiming that they should become free agent because their wages had oot been paid even before yesterday's liquidation.

St Helens have already signed two Oldham forwards, Brett Goldspink and Paul Davidson, but have paid no. transfer fees. Goldspink is' under a Super League contract that has simply been reassigned while no fee has yet heeo agreed for Davidson.

on 31 December and we have registered him from 1 January, said Saints' chief executive. David Howes. "We made an offer for him which was turned down and we are now waiting for advice from the League about Oldham's situation."

Meanwhile, St Helens have been preparing for this morning's clash with Brisbane Broncos with Andy Haigh coming into the squad for the injured Keiron Cunningham. Paul Anderson will be at hooker, a position he has filled occasionally Other clubs have gone into in the reserve team.

Auckland's Stephen Kearney is tackled by Bradford's Graeme Bradley in yesterday's quarter-final.

Misery repeats itself for Bradford

Bradford Bulls ...

A miserable momeot in Bradford's memorable season was within one muffed conversion of repeating itself as they crashed out of the Visa World Club Championship.

The Bulls promised to improve on their last appearance at the Ericsson Stadium, when they were hammered 64-14 in the qualifying stage of the competition. They did - but only just, a miss-hit by the stand-in ideotical scoreline in yesterday's quarter-final.

It hardly mattered. Bradford's effort - frail in defence and, apart from a brief flurry before half-time, unimaginative and error-ridden in attack - was similar enough to their last visit to Auckland to make no difference. The Bulls suffered a blow before the same when the player of the season, James Lowes, was forced to withdraw with a groin kicker, Sean Hoppe, going un- strain. Without his spark at

Langer's unhappy surprise

Bernhard Langer is the last man to lose his cool under normal circumstances but things were far from normal as he played the ninth bole - his last - in the second round of the Linde German Masters in Berlin yesterday.

Langer weot to the hole leading by three shots and hit his hall down the middle of the fairway, only to find it in a beavily sanded divor. The German called for the referee, but was not allowed relief and struck his pitch ioto the water guarding the green. Langer eventually took a doublebogev str.

That meant a round of 69 to end one shot ahead of Jose Maria Olazabai and Thomas Gogele and two ahead of Colin Mootgomerie, Per-Ulrik Johansson, Thomas Bjorn, Andrew Coltart, Jamie Spence and Patrik Sjoland. "The referee would not allow me a free drop. There was obviously too much sand in the divot hole which had not been repaired properly," Langer said.

Montgomerie, playing with Langer, agreed he had been 'very unfortunate" to land in the divot, a shot that could have far more serious consequences than just a reduced lead. Langer is £87,000 behind Montgomerie in the official money list and oeeds to win the first prize of £125,000 to improve his chances of finishing as Europeao No 1.

Oliver is back for more

Spencer Oliver hopes to go one better than Naseem Hamed and stop Italy's Vincenzo Belcastro wheo they meet for the Londoner's European super-bantamweight title at Alexandra Palace tonight. Belcastro, now 36, lost the European hantamweight title to Hamed in Sheffield in May 1994, surviving two knockdowns but still losing by a landslide.

Oliver, whose fight with Patrick Mullings last February earned the Best Cootest of the Year trophy at the British boxing awards this week, has, like Hamed, had a meteoric rise to fame. The 22-year-old, with 12 straight wins, has graduated from a four-round fighter to European champion in just over two years. Oliver said: "Belcastro, despite his age, is very durable, so a win inside the distance would be a boous. Naz may have dropped him early, but he stayed there."

Nicky Piper expects a swift conclusion to his challenge for the World Boxing Organisation light-heavyweight title held by the Pole Dariusz Michalczewski in Hanover, It is certainly the 31-year-old Welshman's last chance to gain a version of the title, having had two previous unsuccessful attempts. Piper said: "I think it'll be a short fight. It looks Ibat way - about seven or eight rounds. I think I'll he able to stop him. He's a very aggressive fighter and I think bis style is made for me."

HOCKEY

South Africa's invasion

South Africans are expected to play a significant role in the 10th seasoo of the men's national league which gets under way tomorrow, following an influx of players which may cause alarm bells to ring at hockey's Milton Keynes headquarters, with possible pleas to limit the number of non-European players each club is permitted.

Chelmsford, readmitted to the National League this season and celebrating their centenary, lead the way. In addition to the return of Mike Cullen, so influential in their success last season, to Chelmer Park, a trio of compatriots arrive from his home city of Durban: Justin King, an international defender, David Staniforth, the Under-21 goalkeeper, and Mike Carr, a cultured midfield player.

At nearby Chigwell, Old Loughtonians include South Africa's Olympic goalkeeper, Brian Myhurgh, io place of Scotland's Alisdair Seatoo, who has left the club. Over at Southgate, three more South Africans, Gregor Maier and Craig O'Hagan from the senior squad and Craig Carorao from the Under-21s have signed on.

Even Oxford University can call on David Eadic, a South African Under-21 from Western Province, and Martin Firer, from Wits University.

Finger sees no weaknesses

Birmingham Bullets' American coach Mike Finger will not be distracted by Loodoo Towers' injury problems when the Budweiser League's last two unbeaten teams meet at the NEC tonight. "I try to convince myself they have weaknesses, but I can't see too many," he said. "They still have outstanding depth." London will be without their England international Neville Austin and there are also doubts over England's Karl Brown and the American James Hamiltoo, who also missed the midweek 75-65 European Cup defeat in Belgrade.

Finger, whose team have won their three league games by a combined total of seven points said: "They were all too close for comfort. It's good to know we handled it but I'd like a few easy games as well."

That is unlikely to happen tonight, even against Towers. A key confrontation will be under the baskets between Birmingham's English centres Clive Allen and the 6ft 11in Chris Haslam, against London's 6ft 10in American Keith Robinson and the 6ft 11in Italian Marco Baldi.

Like Towers, Greater Loodon Leopards will be without a key player after their captain Robert Youngblood chipped a bone and tore ligaments in an ankle last weekend. He may be out until the end of the mooth.

a good start to the week. While I was in Valderrama last weekend on a scouting mission (no luck, Real Betis were playing on Sunday so I had to miss the singles) we gained our first point. Then I went down the table for emphasis, "perhaps to Brighton to help the FA the chairman will give me the plug the World Cup 2006 bid to Brighton to help the FA

As I told the chairman, as money I need to put this great at the Labour Party conference, noying that his bleeper kept go-them soon and he must be Tone looked a bit nervous when he spotted me. We haven't met since I accidentally knocked him off his nag while we were both out fox-hunting with Sir Hirem, Rupert Murdoch and Bernard Ingham in the Quantocks a few years ago. As I approached he had quick word with s sinisterlooking fella alongside and, just as I began saying, "Tony, old mate, not seen you since..." this fella stepped in and gave me the slyest body check since Marco Gentile cracked three of my obs in Turin 20 years ago.

Terribly sorry," he said as I got up, "don't think we've met. Peter Mandelson's the name and Tony's asked me to look after yon. Said he still himmes himself and I'm to see you have some Bolly on the Party."

Well, turned out he was an old fan of Blackfarin Rovers where I'd had my glory days and we were soon remini He didn't half remember it well, though it was a bit an-

ing off. I'm sure I caught sight of one message saying "Milbank response unit: Ask him about the Cup win over Arsenai in '74", but it's probably the champers playing tricks with

Anyway, it got so late it turned out Tone had gone to another function, a dinner with the Asparagus Growers' Union. Big Party stalwarts, according to Pete, who was kind enough to get me a taxi to the station. Wasn't until Clapham Junction I remembered I'd driven down. Thursday I went to that FA coaches conference. They can't teach me much these days but I did learn ooe thing never leave a mobile on when Fergie's doing a speech. He also said you should never use gimmicks in coaching, things like making players do three star jumps and a press-up between heading drills. Huh, he's just trying to wreck my coaching, he knows we're playing

I'll have to increase security at training now I know he's been spying. Otherwise he'll pick up a few more tricks and before you know it he'll have Ryan Giggs doing speedwork in Dr Martens; Peter Schmeichel down at the other Old Trafford sharpening his reac-tions catching cricket halls from the bowling machine: and Becks. Pally and the rest of them playing strip six-a-side - there's nothing like knowing you're down to your jockstrap to make a team defend with their life. And when it rains like it did this week it makes for a belting game. Meanwhile we've got problems for Saturday. I expected Shaun Prone to be on his back again, and Ivor Niggie to be out, but half the team claim they've got flu. At this rate I'll have to play. Wonder if I can get a boot deal sorted.

Paul Gascoigne is the most celebrated example, the Gateshead galumph costing Spurs £2m in a 1988 deal which also landed the infamous Five Bellies. Chris Waddle, who earned Newcastle £590,000 when he made the same move, was already in town to show Gazza where to get the best silly haircrits.

The Waddle of his day, left-winger Albert Gosnell, undertook the journey in 1910 after gaining FA Cup and championship medals at Newcastle. Two years on John Mc Izvish made the reverse trek, as did Bill Nicholson - later Sours' Double-winning supremo - as a wartime guest. Keith Burkinshaw, the manager who brought Ossie Ardiles to White Hart Lane, cut his coaching teeth on Tyneside.

Jim Iley and Kevin Scott later played for both, while Spurs reserves Mark Stimson, Peter Garland and Paul Moran all tried their luck at St James' under the Ardiles-Tony Galvin management duo. Curiously, the only Novocastrian likely to be involved today, Chris Armstrong, is a Cockerel who has

While other clubs have associations with mighty eagles, elegant swans or wise old owls, West Bromwich Albion take their traditional nickname - "Baggies" is the preferred. moniker these days - from the humble thrush (or throstle). On 5 October 1985, Manchester United travelled to Lutoo having won 10 consecutive matches at the start of the season and needing one more victory to equal Tottenham Hotspur's record of 11. United took the lead through Mark Hughes, but David Pleat's Luton rallied to draw the game 1-1. In Italy, Mark Hateley was in negotiations with his club, Milan, over a new contract that would make him English football's second millionaire (Kevin Keegan being the first). Bobby Robson made a trip to watch Hateley in action and saw his England centre forward score against Sampdoria in a 1-1 draw. Robson was also impressed by Milan's Ray Wilkins, but Sampdoria's Trevor Francis got no further than the bench.

In 1996-97 United earned proportionately more points when Keane was not playing than when he was. With Keane, who missed nearly half the season, United's Premiership record was W11, D7, L3. Without him, the figures were W10, D5, L2.

Keane played in the 5-0 defeat at Newcastle in October hut missed the subsequent 6-3 and 2-1 reverses against Southampton and Chelsea as United suffered their traditional autumn wobble. In fact, Keane missed so many games that he only played in two home Premiership matches before Christmas.

To United following a string of imwhich Doncaster Rovers' dwinpressive displays since moving dling hand of diehards probably responded with a wistful "and so say all of us".

They have given up waiting for a messiah in Doncaster. The 1,500 or so who attend today's Third Division basement struggle against Brighton will do so out of a loyalty strained far beyond normal boundaries. Many will be there chiefly to vent their wrath on Rovers' "hacker", Ken Richardson.

Brightoo's travelling support, free at last of the Archer-Bellotti regime hut still commuting to Gillingham for "home" matches, will find unpleasant echoes of their own, acrimonious campaign. Doncaster, though, are not reno equivalent of Des Lynam to highlight what is going on.

Yet in many respects, their plight is worse. Rovers are in "administratioo", with dehts so high that accountants must approve every item of expenditure. Richardson, having parted with Kerry Dixon, runs the team, who occupy bottom place compared with Brighton's positioo two rungs above. Doncaster's 11 League and

.Cup matches have delivered eight defeats and oo wins. Last Saturday they lost to a Torquay team including three YTS boys. while at Belie Vue they have scored one goal and cooceded 18. Hardly surprising given that their summer signings came free from Hyde, Worksop and Gainsborough, and that Richardson's latest recruit, 37year-old Andy Thorpe, last played full-time six years ago.

The response to Keegan and at Fulham, against Oldham, will be revealing after the disquiet of supporters over the ousting of Micky Adams. The Second Division's top match, however, is the meeting of Luton and the leaders Watford, who have

crowd will be at Middlesbrough to see whether Paul Merson can unhinge a Sheffield United rearguard which has leaked just three goals since the arrival of another Paul with a problematic past, McGrath. Bryan Robson. the Boro manager, said yesterday that Glenn Hoddle had told him that Merson remained "very much in his thoughts" for the England squad.

United have won only once in the last 12 trips to Teesside. Manchester City, 6-0 victors but the kings of inconsistency, have s similar ratio from 26 visits to Ipswich. Liverpool, Aston Villa and Chelsea, three of England's survivors in this season's European knock-out competitions, will all start their next ties away from home. Nick Horris reports.

Liverpool, who overcame Celtic in the first round of the Uefa Cup on Tuesday, were given a difficult second-round tie when they were drawn against Strasbourg, the French side who eliminated Rangers.

Aston Villa, who beat Bordeaux in the second round, were drawn against Athletic Bilbao of Spain, while Chelsea, who progressed to the last 16 of the European Cup-Winners' Cup on Thursday, were rewarded with a tie against Tromso, the Norwegiao side. Liverpool and Villa travel to their first leg matches on 21 October, with Chelsea going to Norway two days later. Roy Evans, the Liverpool manager, was not unhappy with his side's draw, but said: "Looking around the rest of the draw there aren't many teams left that you'd say 'I fancy them'. I've seen [Strasbourg] a few times last season and they were clearly a good side, technically excellent, Although they haven't started this seasoo very well you'll find that they'll raise their game to play against us."

Aston Villa's manager, Brian Little, will be returning to against them in the same competition. Villa overcame Bilbao then, but Little expects a tougher contest this time. "The tournament is hard and a lot of people will look upon Bilbao as a threat, having claimed a hell of a scalp in knocking out Sampdoria," he said.

Ruud Guilit, whose Chelsea side perhaps have the easiest passage, thinks that, although they will need the right attitude, having two Norwegians, Tore Andre Flo and Frode Grodas, in their squad "will be an advantage to us and ensure that we don't have too many surprises". Whether the Cup-Winoers' Cup tie later this month will be played in Tromso's 12,000-capacity Alfheim stadium near the Arctic Circle, or in Oslo, has yet to be decided.

The conquerors of Leicester and Arseoal, Atletico Madrid and PAOK Salonika, have been drawn against each other, with the Greek side travelling to Spain for the first leg.

Uefa have ordered Spartak Moscow and Sion to replay their first-round, second-leg match. The Swiss side drew 2-2 draw in Moscow on Wednesday, losing 3-2 on aggregate, but the crossbars on the Russian goals were too low.

Manchester Uoited's Champions' League match with Kosice at Old Trafford is likely to be put back 24 hours to 27 November to allow live television coveragee of that match and Newcastle's game in Barcelona, which will be played on Bilbao 20 years after playing 26 November as scheduled,

The Aberdeen manager Roy Aitken has been given a vote of confidence from the club's directors, even though his side have woo only two league games in 27 and go into today's game at St Johnstone at the bottom of the Premier Division.

The executive vice chairman Stewart Milne yesterday insisted that Aitken's position was not under threat, but he was critical of the playing staff, accusing them of making basic errors. He said: "We can all see that individually the players have the required ability and technical skills.

"As Roy has said before, far too often we're suffering from avoidable basic defensive errors and failing to take advantage of the good opportunioes we're creating.

"We need to achieve greater individual and collective responsibility on the field. We need to achieve much greater communication and support between the players on the field. We need to achieve full concentration on the part of all players for the entire game and every game.

"If we can do that, we will stop making the avoidable errors at the back and start taking more of the goal-making opportunities we have been creating." Milne added: "Roy is not complacent and is fully awate that much still needs to be done to ensure we get the positive result I know our players are more than capable of providing.

"Roy and his team are addressing those areas. They need improving and the spirit and the team feeling among the players has improved significantly. That culminated this week in the team-building exercise Roy initiated by taking the players away from home. We're confident we will reap the rewards of this additional activity tomorrow and throughout the rest of this sea-

"But everyone involved in the club, including the fans, must recognise the collective responsibility for our current and future league position.

"We know we have the attributes and the character required to turn things around here at Pittodrie. It's up to each and every one of us to ensure we do so to go on and achieve the success that we and the fans want and deserve."

Milne insists that at no time has the manager's future beeo discussed by the board.

Aitken, who has firmly refused to discuss his position this week, said: "It was a constructive meeting but all our weekly meetings are." The St Johnstone manager

Paul Sturrock, a former international colleague of Aitken's, is expecting a rough ride today. "Aberdeco will be be up for back oo the rails sooner or later," he said. "They've been playing bet-them credit for and they'll he very tough opposition. With the quality of individuals in the Aberdeeo team

Adams returns ready to play mind games

At the end of Euro 96, Tony Adams was a physical and emotional wreck. His personal life was ravaged by alcoholism and his career was threatened by a knee injury. Fourteen months on he is enjoying a renaissance.

Adams talked to our football correspondent about Arsenal's rise to the top of the Premiership, England's match in Rome, and his new outlook on life.

He may have given up the bottle. begun taking piano lessons and writing poetry, but Tony Adams still relishes a contest. The difference is that, following the awakening of his intellectual side, he is now prepared to engage in a mental duel as well as a physical one.

This change is quickly apparent in any interview situation. Adams just the way I did losing to Wrexwas never a enthusiastic subject, the criticism he received for his alcohol-fuelled indiscretions, and the cruel lampooning of his game, turned him against the media long ago. He remains hostile with all but his closest media confidants hnt, while once he reacted with brief, obvious answers, now he turns the interview into a contest, querying questions, questioning assumptions, looking, always, for the perceived traps. This is not entirely a bad thing as it does make the interviewer think carefully about the questions posed.

Asked for a "thumbnail sketch" of himself after training yesterday he says he "has not the intellect" to answer; asked if English players and teams tend to go for a win even when they only need a draw he says "You expect me to speak for everybody?"; and asked bow long it will take to regain his best form he pauses, perhaps thinking that answering will betray a belief that he is not at his best, slowly repeats the question, then answers, "Two weeks? Three or four years? In 10 years I'll be a half-decent player."

The last question is valid. Hava knee injury that, according to Arsène Wenger, the Arsenal man- now." ager, threatened his career, he has returned at a crucial time for club and country. Today he captains the Premiership leaders against Barusley at Highbury. Next Saturday, the day after his 31st hirthday. he will lead England in Rome. A point will take England to France next summer and, injuries and form permitting give Adams his first experience of the World Cup

Yet he has played only five games this season and has only represented England twice in the 13 months since Glenn Hoddle took over. On Tuesday he was among those at fault when PAOK Salonika scored the goal which ended Arsenal's Uefa Cup campaign. His form is a legitimate "matter of pub-

To be fair, he adds: "My form is fine - I'm working on it. My first game back was good, my second not so good. I always strive to play my best but players have high points and low points, that's only natural.

"I viewed losing to Salonika ham in the first round of the FA Cup in 1992. If you are going to get knocked out, you are better off doing it early on so you can concentrate on the other trophies. My worst one was losing in the semifinal to Tottenham [in 1991]. We had given all that energy only to fall at the final hurdle."

Today's game will be his 516th for Arsenal and, before his "change of life" (that is, giving up the booze) be might have found it difficult to get motivated. "In the past 1 might have thought 'it's only Barnsley' as it can go a bit flat after so many games. But I've realised it won't last for ever: one day the legs stop running. There are two ways to react, you can either bang up the boots or try and prolong it as long as possible. I am doing that, I am seizing the day. Having been ing been troubled for 18 months by sitting on my arse frustrated for a year it's easy to roll up the sleeves

Arsenal under Wenger has helped. "It's lovely driving into work knowing there is no fear attached. You don't get put under pressure, it is very relaxed."

This does not reflect too well on the Highbury regimes of George Graham and, possibly, Bruce Rioch, though Adams added: "Some people still need a kick up the backside and there are other people on the staff that do that."

Adams used to do a fair hit of shouting himself but now he is more likely to have a quiet word. Either way he remains a significant figure at Highbury. "He is a big influence," Wenger said, "He is not just a good player hut also a good team player. He is sensitive to what is going on and knows when there are problems on the field and outside. He does not report to me with them; he and the team can sort them out between them. There is a mutual respect in this team which I have not found before. Nor have I met a player as mentally strong.

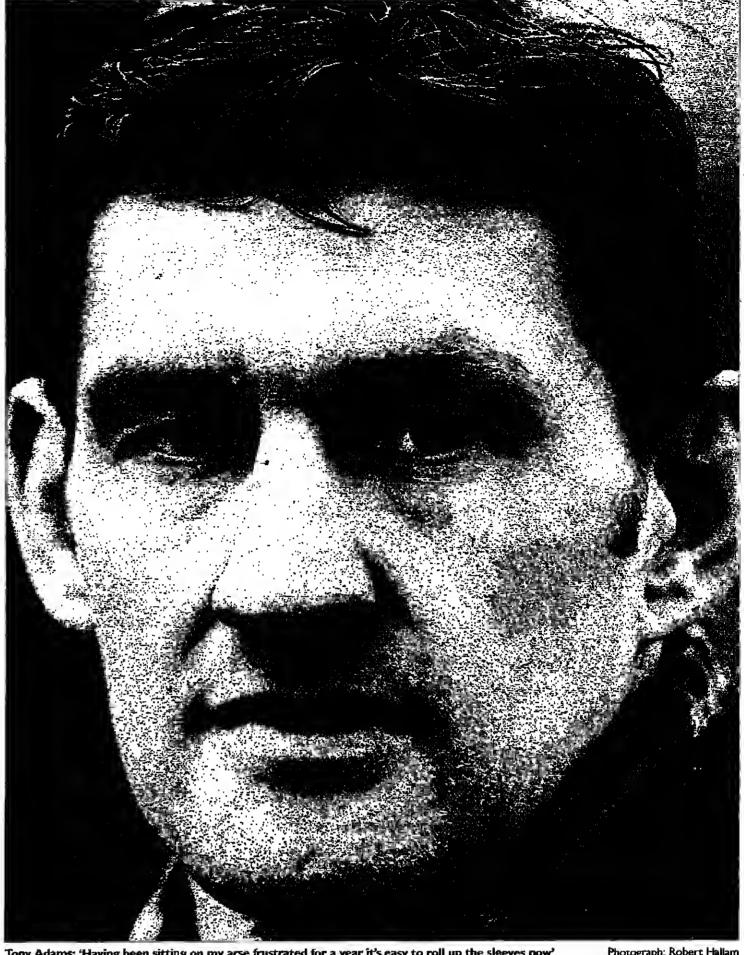

"He is at an important age, one when players think about life. He has decided to combat his problems and it has given him maturity."

And so to Rome for, in all likelihood, his 48th cap and 11th as captain. He has never lost as captain. I don't count the penalties after the Germany semi-final. The game was 1-1. They'll be looking to win but so will we. If you look to draw you might lose, if look to win you might draw.

We have always had passion. There is not a better country in the world for commitment and strength, but we now have brain and brawn. Terry gave us the knowledge and Glenn has added his own hits and pieces. Dennis Bergkamp said they always thought of the English as 'strong but stupid'.

"We have good young players here, there has been a blossoming of talent. We have tended to put foreign players on a pedestal, both players and media. Now, working with them day in and day out, we can see some are special but some are not. They are individuals, like us."

Adams has always reflected on his football but now does so in his life. "It helped me to look at myself as a player so it should belo me in my personal life," he said. "There are softer options and I used to take

Terry Venahles' Australian side month's World Cup qualifying play-offs by strolling to a straightforward 3-0 win over Tunisia in a friendly in Tunis on Wednesday.

It was the Socceroos' 12th match without defeat since the former England manager took over as coach of the national team. He gave a full dehut to the Leeds United midfielder Harry Kewell, who set up the third goal for Matthew Bingley. The other goals came bence the recall for Higuita. from Tenerife's Aurelio Vidmar and Mark Viduka of Croatia Zagreb, who is back in favour after declining to play in the Oceania Zone qualifying games.

Tunisia are one of five African nations who have already qualified for the finals, but they were well beaten by an Australian selection missing several regular players, including Aston Villa's Mark Bosnich and West Ham's Stan Lazaridis. Venables' men face a two-leg play-off against still undecided Asian opponents for a place in France. Kevin Muscat, John Aloisi and Robbie Slater were other English-based players in his line-up.

The Colombians, who have already qualified for the World Cup finals, may have a familiar face in their team in France next summer. They have recalled the eccentric goalkeeper Rene Higuita after an 18-month absence for Wednesday's friendly in Norway.

Higuita has been absent from the team since pulling out of the squad shortly before the start of the qualifying campaign early last year, claiming he was not fit tably that I should immediately enough for international foothall. score a first goal," Ravanelli said.

Since then he has been sacked by the Medellin club, Atletico Nacompleted their warm-up for next cional, for repeatedly missing training, while last year his house in Medellin was bombed by unidentified attackers; he was not at home at the time.

A move to the Mexican club, Veracruz, appears to have restored Higuita's form, despite his cluh's poor results. Farid Mondragon, his replacement in the Colombian side, has suffered a miserable run of form this year.

The young striker impact at the Norwegian Premier League side Stromsgodset that he is expected to play a pivotal part in the impending Norwegian Cup final against Valerengen, and his manager, Dag Vidar Kristoffersen, believes Olsen will eventually follow the Tors, Jans and Egils down that well-trodden path to the English Premiership.

However, British interest is also focused on another product of Norway's footballing expertise which is influential, versatile, and (in foothalling terms at least) extremely cheap.

Certainly, £10,000 sounds a snip, but the catch is that it comes packed in a box, has a plug on the end, and goes by the very un-Norwegian name of Tacticus. In short, it is a computer system; not just any old computer system mind, but (according to the Norwegian Trade Council) "the most advanced and complete football analysis tool on the market". A sense of objectivity is plainly called for, but it is a view endorsed by Kristoffersen, whose season in an effort to end their seesaw-like existence; the Cup fiattributes much of their success

Kristoffersen claims player development is the higgest plus: "Show a player his mistakes rather than simply tell him he's making them, and there's more chance of him putting things right." He is even considering installing a television team began using the system this in the dressing-room and using the system at half-time.

But ently - is that it allows a manager if this system is all it is cracked to analyse and edit a match both up to be, why is it not top of the and Dalglishes of this world? Actually, it might well be. Many Premier League clubs apparently showed an interest when the system was presented on recent FA coaching courses, hut do not want that interest made public, prompting a claim from Kristoffersen that "English clubs are like fortresses: they don't want to share anything".

He claims the Norwegians admire English football for its pace and basic skill, hut reckon it lacks a lot in organisation. That is where he thinks Tacticus might prove its worth. The only club manager who will admit to using Tacticus is Crewe's Dario Gradi. Instead of having to flip through an entire tape using time code, he now has a sophisticated editing system that will record the game's key features and serve as concrete video evidence when he assesses a player's performance.

Tacticus is already used by the Swiss side Grasshopper and the Estonian national side (who must have a blank tape from their home game against Scotland). However, its popularity in this country will largely depend on English football's willingness to embrace new technology. Of course the purists will always prefer the beautiful game to remain a simple game rather than one over-burdened with facts, figures, stats and systems. But Gradi denies that Tacticus is a substitute for good oldfashioned communication between player and manager. He stresses: "It's simply an aid, albeit the single most important coaching aid that I have. We used to have someone sit in the stands and monitor individual players, hut this presents all the evidence in black and white, or better still, in colour."

Evidently, video use has its place in football, if not yet among the refereeing fraternity. Terry Venables' wife admits he studies videos avidly and often determines his tactics accordingly. The opposite, however, is true of Barry Fry who even admits he "doesn't do tacties"... and we all shopping list of the Fergusons know who is the more successful.

Arsenal v Barnsley

Arsenal could be without winger Marc Overmars, who was taken off in the second half of the 1-1 draw with PAOK Salonika which led to the Guinners' exit from the Uefa Cup. The Dutchman will have a late fitness test on an ankle injury. Luis Boa Morte may make his first start since his £2.5m move from Sporting Lisbon in the summer but French striker Nicolas Anelka is also an option after scoring a hat-trick for the reserves on Wednesday. Barnsley manager Danny Wilson has injury problems in his defence. Peter Shirtliff is definitely out with a hamstring injury, while Matt Appleby (hamstring) and Adie Moses (ankle) are very doubtful, which could mean a debut for 19-year-old Chris Morgan, Fellow defenders Nicky Eaden and Neil Thompson have also had recent injury problems, but both are included in the squad after they came through 45 minutes in the reserves in midweek. Striker John Hendrie will be out for 10 days with his hamstring problem following advice from a specialist, while Jovo Bosancic is out with a thigh injury.

Bolton v Aston Villa

Bolton manager Colin Todd will give new record signing Dean Holdsworth his debut alongside Peter Beardsley. Leading goalscorer Nathan Blake is suspended for three matches after being sent off against Manchester United a fortnight ago. Todd has major injury problems in his defence. The South African Mark Fish had fluid drained from his knee last weekend and will not be fit until Monday. Fullback Neil Cox is still undergoing treatment for a hamstring injury. Robbie Elliott is out for the season with a double leg fracture, and Chris Fairclough is unlikely to be back for two months with a knee

Aston Villa will give a fitness test to Mark Draper. The former Leicester playmaker missed the midweek Uefa Cup win over Bordeaux with a hamstring strain. Brian Little will also have to decide whether to start with all three strikers - Stan Collymore, Dwight Yorke and Savo Milosevic - although Yorke is still carrying a groin strain and

Coventry v Leeds

The Coventry goalkeeper Steve Ogrizovic will set a new club record of 488 league appearances today while Coventry manager Gordon

Strachan may give his 18-year-old son Gavin a debut in Premiership football. Strachan Snr has eight players either unavailable or doubtful for today. Paul Williams is serving a three-match suspension, while Marcus Hall (twisted knee), Roland Nilsson (knee), John Salako (hamstring), Paul Teffer (ankle), Martin Johansen (knee), Darren Huckerby (ankle) and Noel Whelan (ankle) are all injured. Strikers Andy Ducros and Simon Haworth have been called into the squad.

Leeds, who lost 2-1 to Bristol City in midweek, but won the tie 4-3 on aggregate, will be without 19-year-old Australian midfielder Harry Kewell, who is suspended after being sent off for two bookable offences in last month's 4-3 win over Blackburn. The Portuguese midfielder, Bruno Ribeiro, and defender David Robertson are both doubtful, suffering from the effects of a virus. George Graham's side are looking for their third consecutive Premiership win.

Man Utd v C Palace

Roy Keane is out for the rest of the season with a ruptured cruciate knee ligament. Nicky Butt (undiagnosed headaches and sickness) and striker Ole Gunnar Solskjaer (thigh strain) were both substituted in the 3-2 midweek win over Juventus and both are doubtful for today. Striker Andy Cole is also injured. Paul Scholes looks certain to start in midfeld, alongside Ronny Johnsen. The Czech winger Karel Poborsky is away on international duty. Defender David May is, in the squad after recovery from a pre-season groin injury.

Attilio Lombardo will play for Palace having been out with a thigh injury. His comeback will be a boost for Palace following their Coca-Cola Cup exit against Third Division strugglers Hull in midweek. Andy Roberts and Bruce Dyer face late fitness tests. Defender Marc Edworthy still has a knee problem but is expected to be fit. Midfielder Simon Rodger is fit, but reserve goalkeeper Carlo Nash is out with cracked ribs and his place on the substitutes' bench will be taken by South African youngster Gareth Ormshaw.

Newcastle v Tottenham

Newcastle striker Faustino Asprilla is expected to be out for four to six weeks after an operation on his lower stomach (for a groin injury) on Thursday. Midfilder Rob Lee is doubtful for today and may also be unavailable for England's match with Italy next week.

Alessandro Pistone is unlikely to be in the Magpies' squad after suffering a foot injury in the 1-0 defeat at Chelsea last week. Stuart Pearce has an outside chance of playing for the first time since Au-

Tottenham's own injury crisis is cleaning and Les Ferdinand will return to St James' Park partnering Chris Armstrong in attack. The centre-backs Ramon Vega. John Scales and Gary Mabbutt are all fit again, giving manager Gerry Francis selection options at the back. Norwegian front-man Steffen wersen will be out for another month with an ankle injury. Ferdinand and the Frenchman, David Ginola, were both playing for the home side when the Magnies beat Tottenham 7-1 last December, and will be seeking a reversal of for-

If you want to get ahead, get a new stadium. That would appear to be the conclusion to be drawn from attendence figures for the first two months of the season. The statistics show increases at most clubs, but perticularly at those which have moved recently into new homes. The most spectacular rise is that of Sunderland, who suffered the als appointment of relegation from the Premiership in May and have hardly set the First Division alight this season.

However, the Wearside club's fans have clearly relished the move to their new Stanform of Light, Sunderland's average gate this season after five.

Anome matches is $1.983, an increase of nearly 60 per cent on the Premiership average at Roker Park last season. Elsewhere in the First Unasion wild destrough, also relegated in the summer, have continued to draw capacity crowds to their new Riverside Stadium.

Attendances are also up at Stoke (tranks fargely to a big crowd for the ... fast gains at the Britannia Stadium), Huddersfield, Northampton and Sizesia; who have all moved into new proends in recent years. The only problem for Premierably chois in their modernised all sealed stadioms is that many are unable to meet demands for actions. Only fiveare operating at less in an HSL per cent of their capacity.

Liverpool and Trateman Holspar both have received capacities the to rebeliding work. And the major reason for the signit drop in Premiership. attendances is that some maps resiste to an augment of the attendances is that some of the three promitted clubs, Bolton, Barnsley and Crystal Palace: an able to match Middlesbrough, who regularly that their 30,000 capacity provide in the rop flight, last season.

Sheff Wed v Everton

Sheffield Wednesday's central defender Des Walker is doubtful due to a virus. Walker, who struggled through the midweek Coca-Cola Cup game against Grimsby, is currently on a course of antibiotics and will seek a doctor's advice on whether he will be fit enough to play. Manager David Pleat is still also without Jon Newsome, Graham Hyde, Andy Booth and Peter Atherton through injury, while Patrick Blondeau is suspended. Wednesday are looking for only their second win of the season, but if they achieve it they will leapfrog today's opponents and move out of the relegation zone.

Duncan Ferguson will miss his third successive match for Everton with calf problems. Everton's manager Howard Kendall is likely to add Craig Short to his squad if there is no reaction to his groin problem after training yesterday. Danny Williamson is fit again and returns, while a late decision will be made on midfielder Tony Grant, who injured an ankle in the S-O midweek Coca-Cola Cup win over Scunthorpe.

Southampton v West Harrison 8

Southampton manager Dave Jones will have a fully fit squad to choose" from for the first time this season. Norwegian striker Egil Ostenstad (ankle) has recovered and Matt Le Tissier (harnstring) proved he is fully fit by scoring twice on Wednesday as Saints beat Brent-ford 2-0 in the Coca-cola cup. Defender Ken Monkou may return" after a groin Injury, and midfielder Robbie Slater is back from international duty with Australia. Defenders Jason Dodd, Alan Neilson and Simon Charlton are all in contention, after shaking off ankle injuries, as are Claus Lundekvam and Richard Dryden, recovered from knee problems sustained in midweek. Transfer-listed West Ham striker lain Dowie is certain to play against his former club, but midfielder lan Bishop, also on the transfer list, is likely to be on the bench. Paul Kitson, Stan Lazaridis and John Moncur are all injured, while another former Saint, defender Richard Hall, is sidelined long-term with a knee injury. Julian Dicks is also out indefinitely, while on-loan striker lan Moore will be on the bench.

Wimbledon v Blackburn Leading score

Wimbledon manager Joe Kinnear made eight changes from the team which drew 0-0 at Tottenham last week for the 4-1 midweek Coca-Cola Cup win at Millwall. He should revert to last Saturday's side for today's game. Midfielder Neal Ardley is still suffering from a knee injury and Marcus Gayle is also struggling to be fit, while Robbie Earle is on international duty with Jamaica. Jon Goodman will undergo a cruciate ligament operation on his knee and will miss the remainder of the season. Blackburn's England winger Stuart Ripley is nearing full recovery from his hamstring injury but manager Roy Hodgson will not risk him today. Chris Coleman has played two games in his comeback after rupturing his Achilles tendon a year ago but Hodgson also wants to give him more time to recover. The defender Marlon Broomes is still out with his knee ligament problem while full-back Patrick Valery begins a three-match suspension.

Liverpool v Chelsea

Liverpool will still be without defenders Mark Wright and Dominic Matteo for tomorrow's game. Three players who are recovering from injuries, Neil Ruddock, Jamie Redknapp and Oyvind Leonhardsen, are all still short of match fitness and unlikely to play. It is likely that they will play in further reserve matches before a possible return in the Merseyside derby on IB October. There have been no further injury problems following the game against Celtic in midweek: and it is likely that Liverpool will be unchanged with the possible exception of Michael Thomas returning in midfield. Gianfranco Zola and Mark Hughes are likely to return for Chelsea. The pair were rested in Thursday's Cup Winners' Cup win at Slovan Bratislava but seem likely to replace Gianluca Vialli and Tore Andre Flo up front. Michael Duberry could play, as a suspected ankle fracture turned out to be less serious and he has re-started training, Franck Leboeuf is suspended. The Nigerian Celestine Babayaro, a substitute on Thursday, is in the squad.

Football attendances are on course to reach their highest levels for 18 years. As Paul Newman reports, the latest boom has been fuelled entirely by clubs outside the Premiership

The financial gap between the haves and have-nots may still be widening, but football's everrising profile at the highest level is having a beneficial effect throughout the game. Contrary to a widespread heen focusing on the FA Carling Premiership at the expense of other areas of the game, the rise in attendances this season is down entirely to the Nationwide League. On the evidence of the season so far, the professional game in England and Wales is poised to enjoy its higgest percentage increase in league gates for 40 years

With 20 per cent of the season's league matches played, attendance figures for the Premiership and Nationwide League show that gates are on course to reach a season's total view that public interest has of 24.5 million, an increase of 1.7m on last year and the highest figure for 18 years.

Based on first

The figures, compiled exclusively for the Independent, show that the Nationwide League is set to welcome through its turnstiles its highest number of supporters for more than a quarter of a century.

Premiership gates are marginally down on last year, hut the Nationwide League First Division is heading for a total attendance of 8.4m, which would be the highest since the 1959-60 season and an increase of more than 20 per cent on last year. Only 12 years ago, the total for the Second Division (now the First Division) was 3.6m, less than half this season's projected

While the three clubs relegated from the Premiership -Sunderland, Middlesbrough and Nottingham Forest - have provided a significant boost to First Division attendances, other clubs are showing significant increases, with 18 of the division's 24 clubs enjoying higher gates. In the Second Division 19 of the 24 clubs are showing an increase. as are 14 of the Third Division's 24 members.

The figures buck other major trends in the game, which have seen more and more emphasis placed on the Premiership. This year's annual report by Deloitte & Touche showed that the financial gap between the Premier League and Nationwide League has continued to widen with the Premier League now accounting for two thirds of the game's revenue. Combined with the "Bosman" ruling, which has cut the amount of transfer fees going into the lower divisions, this appeared to spell doom for smaller clubs, but the attendance figures will give encouragement.

Although outside factors may have had an influence - the feel-good factor since the election, extra cash in pockets helped by the recruitment of

Fans at Sunderland's new Stadium of Light. The Wearside club have the best support outside the Premiership, with their gates up this season by nearly 60 per cent to an average of 31,983. Last season in the Premiership they averaged 20,067 thanks to huilding society flotations, and even the Indian summer - these are unlikely to account for the majority of the increase. The game's growing popularity stems largely from the Premiership's rising profile.

Part of the reason for the increase in Nationwide League culty many fans find in buying tickets for Premiership matches: 10 of the Premiership's 20 clubs factor of all. A post-war low total

Lewis primed for risk game against unpredictable Pole

Tonight's heavywelght title fight between the champion Lennox Lewis and the controversial contender Andrzej Golota has the makings of a classic encounter where anything could happen. Glyn Leach, in Atlantic City, weighs up the odds.

For Lewis, 32, a dramatic, resounding win must be the aim. Lewis is still remembered as the complacent fighter stopped in two rounds by Oliver McCall in September 1994 rather than the dreadnought who forced McCall to quit in their rematch. Lewis's first defence of his second reign found Henry Akinwande easily discouraged and, like McCall, his challenge terminated in round five.

Certainly, Lewis is underrated and under-valued in the USA. But is Golota over-rated? Has the continuing clamour for a white heavyweight champion blinded the Pole's new found army of admirers? Doubts about Golota, 29,

Tales of "Dishwasher Repair Man Number Fifteen" are a gift to those selling extended warranties that guarantee "peace of mind" in the event of breakdown.

Rachel Fosen investigates whether these products are really worth the money or whether consumers are unwittingly buying policies that are overpriced, oversold and overrated.

We've all heard the story. The appliance blows up and the repair man comes round. He sucks his teeth, warns it will need a new part and departs 15 minutes later, having extracted his £45 call-out fee. Three weeks later, the machine is still on the blink, the kids are wearing yesterday's dirty noderwear and the house is full of damp, handwashed clothes.

Apocryphal? Perhaps not. What is clear though is that television consumer programmes often unwittingly heighten fears that household appliances will break down, making the packaged insurance that electrical retailers are so eager to sell with your new product look particularly attractive.

Mark-ups on the policies are often higher than those on the appliances themselves. These insurance policies could become an eveo more significant money-spinner for retailers next year if margins on white goods become slimmer still. The Monopolies and Mergers Commission has proposed that the recommended retail price system on white and brown goods be scrapped. White goods include dishwashers and fridges whereas televisions and camcorders are classed as brown goods.

Consumer groups have warned that exa bad deal. The Consumers' Association er, but if the in-store salesman has already has branded the policies "overpriced, oversold and overrated".

Earlier this year the Office of Fair Trading said although the cost of extended warranties on electrical goods had falleo since its investigation three years ago, the policies were still poor valoe.

"In most cases extended warranties are still significantly more expensive than the likely cost of repairs over the warranty period," said John Bridgeman, Director General of Pair Trading.

Retailers' warranties may be even worse value in the wake of changes in the Conservative government's last Budget in November 1996. The Chancellor announced. that henceforth, insurance premium tax; which normally adds 4 per cent to the cost of a policy, would rise to 17.5 per cent in.

the case of warranties sold by retailers. Although most retailers said they would absorb these extra taxes within the existing price of the warranties, it is difficult for shoppers to judge whether this has taken place. Moreover, if true, it also gives an indicator to the extent of the profits which some retailers made from the sale of this

Just how likely is it that your cooker will leave you in the lorch, packing up just before a dinner party and leaving yoo with a hefty repair bill? Not very, according to research by the Consumers' Association. It found there was a one-io-six chance that even the least reliable type of appliance would break down more than once in the four years following the free one-year guarantee period. TSB, which offers its own appliance repair insurance, says average claim values on domestic appliances are between £70 and £150. Products which use water and have moving parts - washer/dryers and dishwashers - are the most likely to go wrong. Most reliable are fridges, cookers and televisions.

Some products, particularly if they get heavy use, might be worth insuring. Retailer Curry's charges between £149 and £199 for a five-year warranty oo a washing machine. At rival Comet, a five-year warranty costs £169.99 on a £300 washing machine.

Comet has introduced cashback warranties, where the retailer promises to refund the price of the warranty at the end of the period as long as no claims have been made. But you have to be oo the ball to get your money back, remembering not only of the period, but also to apply for the rebate within a mooth when the five-year period is up.

Extended warranties often cover the first year of a product's life. This can be wasted because any faults are likely to be covered by the manufacturer's guarantee.

Unioo and Midland offer policies. · A TSB policy may be taken out when the appliance is oew, but premiums only become payable once the manufacturer's guarantee runs out. Also, the premiums are paid monthly, rather than up front. A washing machine costs £1.78 a month to insure in the first year after the guarantee expires, theo £4.57 a month for the next three years.

Midland will insure up to 17 appliances for £11 a mooth. Norwich Union's policy charges start at £6.99 a month. Check whether the policy offers a new machine if the old one is a write off, whether there's an emergency claim line and whether the insurer arranges and pays for the repair.

in anger" cooversations. These are the type where the person you are speaking to makes out that you have made a mistake hut it was only to be expected.

Such a conversation took hosted this week by the Association of British Insurers, the industry trade body.

A Scottish Amicable exccutive came to my table to take issue with the scathing financial advisers. To get comments in this column about the company's Bonus ers complaining that it was Bond, a fund which mimics the performance of the FTSE 100 share index. The column referred to the extremely heavy charges levied on the Boous Bond, which are far in excess of those made for investors who put their money into similar tracker PEPs offered by, say, Legal & General and Gartmore.

The bond is only available to ScotAm policybolders who receive a payont as part of the company's takeover by Prudential. "Well, of course, you must understand that the tikely payout to policyholders is likely to be far less than minimum payments accepted by the Gartmore and L&G schemes," was the gist of his sortowful comments.

He is both right and wrong. The minimum contribution to be all about, the least they into L&G and Gartmore is greater than the average of £550 to be paid to policybolders. But both those companies have confirmed they are happy to accept smaller regular premiums which cease after one or two months. More important is another feature of the Bonus Bond. Here at The Independent, we ransacked our files to find the io sorrow.

I hate "more in sorrow than original press release announcing details of this bond.

We couldn't find ooe. ScotAm tells me that it didn't send one out because it chose to direct mail only its million-odd policyhotders with the details instead. It place at an awards ceremony claims it didn't want to be inundated by applications from non-members. As if.

the fact that ScotAm deals almost solely with independent round the problem of advispoaching their clients, Scot-Am has paid 3 per cent commission to advisers for every customer who responded to the bood, whether the IFA gave advice oo it or oot. Io other words, an adviser with, say, 20 ScotAm clients all receiving the average £550 payoot would receive £330 for doing sod all. In fact, many advisers will have scores of such clients: their commission will rise commensurately. That may explain why IFAs were not exactly raring to condemn the company for its lacklustre product,

I offer this story as a parable of the financial services industry today. If its members want to "hocour" journalists, as this week's shindig in London was meant should do is not to presume on our stupidity.

It is still not too late for ScotAm and Prudential, its ultimate owner, to apologise for what appears to be a case of sharp practice.

They should also offer their money back to any aggrieved policyholder. And I write this more in anger than MONEY MAKEOVER

Comfortable enough to enjoy retirement

Name: Edward Johnson

Occupation: Retired research

chemist The problem: When Mr Johnson retired nine years ago, he gave half of his retirement lump sum to his wife to invest as she pleased. She chose to invest in a balanced portfolio of unit trusts, PEPs, National Savings

Mr Johnsoo invested his capital in a portfolio managed by Nat West. He invested £60,000 in 1988 and even though he withdrew £5,000 in 1996, the portfolio is worth only £69,000 (£45,000 in shares and £24,000 in PEPs). He is concerned that the portfolio is not performing well. While he received £586 in income in the past six months, the capital value fell by £1,544. Mr Johnson has an annual index-linked pension of £15,000 and he and his wife have full state pensions. They live comfortably on this income and so the provision of extra income from investments is not so important. The Johnsons also have £4,000 in a curreot account earning oo interest. Mr Johnson wants to make the most of his available capital, living comfortably and leaving some of the couple's assets to their two sons. The adviser: Julie Lord, managing director of Cavendish Financial Management, Summit House, Windsor Place, Cardiff (01222 665588). She is also chairman of the Institute of Financial Planning, the professional body for financial planners.

The advice: Mr Johnsoo's portfolio should be redesigned to concentrate on growth only. If he needs more mooey in the future he cao always sell shares or units to provide funds. This will allow him to make use of his Capital Gains Tax (CGT) allowance of £6,500 per year to obtain tax-free growth. This may not be necessary as he already has £19,000 in deposit/curreot accounts and does not see the need for large cash sums except for holidays which are planned in advance. Four thousand pounds is too much to keep in a current account. I recommend that part of this capital is reinvested when his portfolio is reviewed. The balance could be so that any returns they do receive placed in a high-interest paying current account.

I suggest the Johnsons co-ordinate their portfolios a little more closely. Mr Johnson's portfolio is too small to be invested in direct equities and there seems little value in paying annual management fees for only a small number of different holdings which are changed infrequently. Better value and performance might be achieved by consolidation.

Andrew Verity stakes them out.

Men in dark vans with tinted windows parked outside your house for days are not just the devices of the paparazzi or Roger Cook's investigative team. They are techniques endorsed by some of the most high-profile companies in the insurance innues to be open season on those with menbusiness to check up on those whom they suspect of a false claim.

the country's leading insurers, and passed exclusively to The Independent, reveal just how far many insurers are willing to go to make sure policyholders are not cheating them, even when they have no substantial evideoce that there is a claim.

The key document comes from the PHI Forum, an association for providers of permanent health insurance. These policies pay out up to 75 per cent of the policyholder's income if a long-term disability makes work impossible. The biggest providers involved include Black Horse Life, Allied Dunbar, Norwich Union, Friends Permanent Insurance and Zurich Life, who sell more than 80,000 policies every year between them.

The document reveals the insurers' criteria for how to choose a case suitable for a private investigator.

The forum recommends: "Some diseases predispose themselves to private investigation. These are the diseases that do not have precise medical evidence. We would include ME, RSI, musculo skeletal [diseases] including backs, fibromyalgia, mental illness and stress."

Mental health groups see the document's instant suspicion of the mentally ill and its apparent disregard for rights of privacy as outrageous. June McKerrow, director of the Mental Health Foundation, says: "It contal health problems."

It is not malingerers alone who are spied Documents circulating among some of on. William Lyons, 53, who permanently injured his back while working as a civilian for Durham police, was awarded £45,000 by a court in July after a woman with a secret camera in her bag tricked her way into his house. She tried and failed to get evidence showing Mr Lyons was not really injured. He was.

Mark Evans, a financial consultant from Abertillery, in Gweot, was last year awarded £350,000 in a similar out-of-court set-

Insurance companies that provide permanent health insurance (PHI) insist their controversial methods are vital to safeguard geouine policyholders from those who claim fraudulently.

According to leading provider Uoum, ocarty one in 20 of those claiming is fraudulent. Payouts, of up to 75 per cent of salary until retirement, are potentially vast. If false claims were overlooked, premiums would rise massively. Examples of fraud include:

An east London businessman claimed o car accident left him with a back disability. His insurance company asked him to visit an assessment centre in London. His GP protested he could not travel that far. A visitor hired by the insurance company then discovered he'd planned a holiday in Spain.

A policyholder claiming from his PHI cover for back injury was found to have

Pretext phone calls, when, for example, an investigator poses as an employer offering a lucrative job, are acceptable, the insurers say. "Taping telephone calls is acceptable as evidence. The other party does not need to be told that the call is being vices, the insurers look for special skills: taped." However, care must be taken: "If

A Chorlton cabbie who claimed £75,000 after arguing that whiplash injuries from a car smash in 1988 meant he could no longer work was filmed plying for trade at Manchester Airport. I lo some cases, doctors are prepared to initiate false claims, including a Stockport GP who is alleged to have written bogus reports on road accident victims and pocketed the money. He is on trial at Maochester Crown Court.

But some insurers still question the need to hire private eyes so quickly simply because a patient has a condition that is difficult to verify. Companies such as General Assurance are using health visitors who can help claimants in their rehabilitation before the claim becomes fraudulent.

that the callback service operated by British Telecom may allow the claimant to ascertain who has called."

The techniques are so controversial that some question whether they stray outside the law. The Best Practice Notes recommend that private eyes obtain confidential medical records without the permission of the supposed suspects. A spokesman for the Data Protection Registrar says passing on computerised medical records would be illegal without substantial evidence of crime. Some insurers fear that private eyes who go "Language skills. The ability to operate pretext phone calls are made, remember too far may find themselves breaking the law.

The trick is locating the 5 per ceot which will answer our questions, advise us and tell us what we need to know to be able to make our investment

Assuming you are connected to the Internet and are ready to become a road warrior oo the information superhighway, you are likely to realise fairly quickly that the highway you are on is a touch short on signposts. Most of those that do exist have a distinct bias towards the USA, a fact which becomes quickly apparent if you try to use most of the so-called search engines on the web. So where do we find out where we want to go today?

A handful of websites offer a general introduction to personal finance with advice and information, but you may feel that you could just as easily get this kind of approach from a book which is likely to be more portable, more easy to read than a computer screen and which requires only the power supply of your own mind. If all you want is a directory of the personal finance sites worth checking out, there are two poteotial starting points.

Moneyworld includes a directory of links to personal finance websites which is one of the most comprehensive and well-organised of its type, with brief descriptions of each site to guide you. Financial Information Net Directory (Find) is a straightforward directory of financial services websites of interest to a UK audience.

What the best general personal finance websites can offer you, which a book cannot, are up-to-date prices, performance and statistical data which you can analyse and manipulate.

Interactive Investor and Moneyworld both include performance data

er sites and both are free to access although Interactive Investor does require you to register as a user.

Interactive Investor allows you to search its news database of corporate press releases and also has a catalogue of books on investment which you can order from the site.

Moneyworld, which does not ask you to register, is best described as a magazine on the web with a strong statistical content. The site has its own search engine, PowerSearch, which allows you to search unit trusts, investment trusts, pensions, life funds and shares by past performance.

If you would like to keep your free conversion shares beyond the reach of the taxman, you'll need to put them into a PEP. (It's the only way that you can avoid paying income and capital gains tax.)

But which one to go for? Why not plump for our No-Cost Windfall PEP. No other fund manager offers a Windfall PEP this popular.

Our No-Cost Windfall PEP, as the name suggests, won't cost you a penny to PEP your shares."

It's flexible too. You can keep your shares as they are, and you can hold as many different windfall shares as you like. Or, if you prefer, you can switch them into any of Fidelity's top-performing funds. And remember, save with Fidelity and you save with a PEP specialist. With over £340 billion funds under management we are the largest investment manager in the world.

No wonder we have more windfall customers than any other fund manager.

Hurry though, the Chancellor only allows you 42 days from the original date of allocation to put your shares in a PEP. So ring now, fill in the coupon or speak to your IFA. And put on your climbing boots.

THE JONATHAN DAVIS COLUMN

Samuelson's argument still holds true

Time passes and the caravan of luminaries in the world of finance and economics moves on with it. How widely. I wonder, does the name of Paul Samuelson still resonate among those under the age of 35? This wise and feisty man, once described with feeling by a contemporary as "a human mainframe", has good claim, along with his great rival, Milton Friedman, to have been the most influential economist of the post-war period.

In a career that has left virtually no corner of economics untouched, he was the man who first took the philosophies of Keynes and propagated them far and wide across the world. He was the first American economist to win the Nobel Prize for economics and wrote what proved to be the standard textbook on economics for a whole generation of students.

Samuelson's work has covered so many different subjects - his collected works run to six volumes and more than 400 academic papers - that it is easy to overlook his contribution in specific fields.

As it happens, one of the areas where he has had the greatest influence is in investment. As an admirer of Keynes, who was a noted speculator as well as a professional economist, he was one of the first economists to try and understand why markets should behave in the way that they do. A paper he wrote in the 1960s, dryly entitled "Proof That Properly Antieipated Prices Fluctuate Randomly", was the basis of what has since come to be known as the concept of efficient markets.

This is the notion that competition is such in large and well capitalised stock markets that it is difficult for anyone, even professional investors, io make consistent excess returns from them, excess returns in this context meaning higher returns than the market averages, after allowing for the different degrees of risk adopted. He later summed up his philosophy as "no easy pickings, no sure thing gains". When Samuelson first propounded this potentially radical idea, it was greeted with astonishment, bordering on outrage, on Wall Street, which was hardly a surprise when you begin to and has compiled a consistent abovethink through the implications, Never one to want to avoid making waves himself concluded in a 1974 article that argument which I believe holds as the best thing most professional fund managers could do was to pack their hags and go home. But, as a pragmatist, who like Keynes has always liked to dabble in the markets himself, he also had some serious advice for or-, dinary investors.

This was that the best thing they could do, once they had decided to invest in equities in the first place, was to put the bulk of their money into a low-cost index-tracking fund. He has long been a fan of the Vanguard. Group, a fund management company which sells exactly such index-tracking average performance.

The line of reasoning, as those who if the opportunity arose, Samuelson have read this column will know, is an broadly true today in general as it did when Samuelson first propounded it. It does not mean, as Jason Hathorn, a director of the specialist fund management group Buchanan Partners has kindly pointed out to me, that there are a number of ways in which investors cannot still hope to add value by adding a slice of active management on top of their basic indexed portfolio.

One of the arguments for investing in a professionally managed European or emerging markets fund, for example, is that there are good grounds for believing that other markets are not it as the UK and United States and therefore that it will still be possible to find profitable pricing anomalies there.

Like Barclays Global Investors, whom I wrote about recently, Buchanan Partners believes that it is possible to use quantitative stock selection methods to exploit specific arcas of inefficiency in the UK market. Their track record to date suggests that they may well be right, although how long these particular anomalies will persist is something which is by definition unknowable. Samuelson would not disagree. In two recent articles for the Journal of Portfolio Munagement, he looked back on the 30 or so years of research that has been carried our since he first started developing the efficient markets bypothesis. His conclusion is that, while many individual anomalies have been shown to exist, the "jury of history" has failed to find "systematic inefficiency that exercisers of judgement could use to achieve excess risk-corrected returns". In other words, nobody has yet succeeded in disproving the basic thrust of the efficient markets concept.

Note that Samuelson's argument now, as before, is not that it is impossible for some professional fund managers to achieve excess returns. He explicitly allows the possibility that a handful of exceptionally talented individuals, such as Warren Buffett, can outperform the market on a consistent basis, though most will not, partly because they tend to trade too much and fritter away some of their gains in high dealing costs.

His case has always been that such exceptional investing talents will normally use their talent to make money for themselves, rather than rent themselves out to others; and that it is difficult and/or expensive for ordinary investors to take advantage of such talents even if they are able to identify

One thing that tends to happen, for example, is that most of the excess returns that the good managers achieve are simply absorbed by the higher fees that the managers with the best records are able to charge. This is one reason why the unit trusts with the best performance records tend also to be the ones with the highest initial charges and often the highest annual charges pay for what you get, but what you get, quite often, once you tot up the costs, is not worth paying for, compared with what you get from indexing.

To many people, anything to do with shares is not only considered a mystery but is also reparded as deadly dull. Of course many subjects are also considered uninteresting until we find out more about them.

Many people switch off when financial matters are discussed because they think the subject is beyond their comprehension.

Here is a different view of the stock market: "It is like a real-life soap opera with a cast of thousands. It has star players, the occasional unknowns achieving overnight fame. births, marriages, intrigue, success stories, feuds, dominant personalities, weak individuals and power struggles."

One by-product of increas ing competition for graduate customers, considered by banks to be potential high-flyers, is their willingness to offer packages that aim to get students over the first few years of postgraduation hardship. All the traditional high street banks offer cheap graduate loan facilities.

Barclays and Lloyds offer graduates a maximum loau of £5,000, but be prepared to pay more interest if you want longer to pay the amount back. The Barclays loan is fixed at 9.9 per cent APR per annum and must be paid back over two years. Lloyds allows graduates five years but the interest is higher at 10.5 per cent APR per year.

Nat West offers a maximum loan of £10,000, repayable at 8 per cent APR per year over seven years. Midland also offers a £10,000 maximum loan, repayable over five years at 9.9 per cent APR.

An Equitable way to top up your company pension.

Did you know that to receive the maximum pension available, you would typically have to be a member of the same company pension scheme for 40 years?

Or that changing your job, even once, could dramatically reduce your pension? So that, just when you have more time to enjoy life, you have less money.

Topping up your company pension with an Equitable Free-Standing Additional Voluntary Contribution Scheme can help bridge the gap. You make contributions from your gross income, with tax relief at the highest rate you pay. Remember that the value of tax relief available will depend on individual circumstances, and that current legislation can change in the future. What's more, we don't believe in paying commission to third parties for the introduction of new business.

Dangerous sports can put your insurance at risk

You'd think insurers would want their clients to keep as fit as possible. But, as Paul Slade discovers, many sports can leave your premiums and cover looking less than

Hang-gliders, potholers, mountaineers and polo players are just a few of the people who may find their weekend sport creates problems with their life and health in-

One area likely to be hit is PHI, or permanent health insurance, which provides policyholders with an income when unable to work through illness or accident. Some insurers, such as Abbey Life and Eagle Star, will refuse to pay out if the injury arose through any activity on their list of dangerous sports. Others will accept the risk, but charge a higher premium. A few will look in detail at the circumstances involved and may make no extra

Colin Young of Unum, a spe-cialist health insurer, says: "What we're looking for is people who are pursuing these sports in a regulated environment and following safety procedures. If it's motorised hanggliding, we'd want to know they've got a private pilot's licence. If it's parachuting, we'd want to see they're doing it as part of a club."

The individual's level of experience also counts for a lot. In cases like this, Mr Young says, no extra loading may be needed. Where loadings are deemed necessary, they could add anything from 25 per cent to 100 per cent to the size of the premiums. The same principle applies to life insurance and private medical cover although, in the case of life insurance, you are less likely to face exclusions than a simple hike in premiums.

Less hazardous sports, such as rugby or footbell, seldom trouble underwriters. You may find, however, that health insurance underwriters are tougher on sports such as rugby than their life insurance counterparts. This is because you have a higher chance of being injured on the rugby field than of dying there. Application forms will ask you to specify any dangerous sports you may be involved in. Those admitting to daredevil hobbies get a second questionnaire asking for more details.

These forms are designed to flag up not only risky sports, but also any hazards involved in your work. Friends' Provident, for example, has one question on its form designed to uncover any applicants who may have forgotten to mention their work in bomb disposal.

It is important to complete them honestly. Admitting only to a little light golf when you spend every spare minute hot air ballooning could invalidate any claim you may later need to make. Independent financial adviser Amanda Davidson says: "I'm a great believer in putting everything down on the form. If you had your tonsils out at the age of two, put it down."

Ms Davidson's own passion is for scuba diving. But because she sticks to safe areas and relatively shallow dives, she has found no need to pay extra for her own insurance. Mr Young recommends going back to your insurer or adviser to see if the experience you have gained in your chosen sport may qualify you for lower premiums.

We will reassess the case," he says. Ms Davidson adds: "If I get a situation with a client where the insurer says they don't like a certain sport or they want to put an extra on the premium, I tend to argue the toss with the underwriters and negotiate. They will reduce loadings or take them off. So don't accept the first loading they come up with, or the first exclusion."

Cover can help soften the blow if you're injured

Every year, 19 million sports in- for an amateur team of up to juries are reported to GPs or 20 players. Each £100 will buy hospital emergency departments - a quarter of them caused by football. For most people, the only way to soften the blow is to have some form of insurance cover.

The first step is to check whether you are covered by a work scheme. Many employers do have group medical insurance schemes for their staff. is not generous, in soccer there You can then receive non-NHS treatment if necessary.

The problem comes where employers' policies have a clause excluding certain sports, or even sports deemed to be dangerous. In this case, private cover is needed.

Bupa does not have a specific sports injury policy. But its BupaCare scheme, typically costing £41.61 a month for a single person aged 30, gives cover for any in-patient hospital treatment. This includes Xrays, surgery and hospital stays. BupaCare policies also provide out-patient treatment, such as physiotherapy, costing up to £500 a year. Sports clubs can obtain cover for individual members at a 15 per cent discount.

Another route is to insure the entire team rather than the individual. IGI Insurance. based in Nottingham, provides this service for most team sports. Its most popular cover is for football clubs.

Mark Searcy, business manager at IGI Insurance, said: "We price the cover for a club in units of £100, which means they can choose exactly how much they spend. The cover is £1,000 compensation for death, loss of eye or limb, or total disablement. Benefit of up to £10 per unit per week for a total of 104 weeks is also paid to those in gainful employment, subject to a seven-day deferment."
There is also £500,000 public liability cover.

Although the amount paid are roughly three individual claims per season for every four policies. Rugby, which is three times as risky, costs £200 per unit of cover. Hockey comes in at about £30, with cricket costing £30 and volleyball and netball £25.

Another company, Amsport, offers the Gameplan policy against sporting injury. It covers 101 different sports, including aerobics, tennis, golf, squash, ice bockey and martial arts. Cover starts from £3.55 a month for low-risk sports, up to £10.55 a month for high-risk activities such as American foot-

It includes benefits of up to £100 a week, plus hospital benefits of up to £30 a day, dental fees of up to £275, plus physiotherapy costing up to £300.

Those permanently disabled receive up to £75,000 and £37,500 is paid on accidental death. Liability insurance of np to £1m is included.

Pros have other rules

Professional footballers and other full-time sports people face a different range of problems in arranging their own finances. We tend to think of famous faces such as Ryan Giggs or Ian Wright, whose income now should be sufficient to set them up for life. But only about 800 of the UK's 2,600 professional footballers, for instance, enjoy the enhanced earning power of playing in the Premiership. In the lower divisions, many players will be earning little more than the fans.

One thing the Premiership players have in common with their more lowly brethren is that both groups must pack a whole career into a few years.

Mick McGuire, assistant chief executive of the Professional Footballers' Association, says: "The average career expectancy as a professional is eight years, and 50 per cent of those who sign professional contracts are no longer professional in two years' time. Players may be retiring from football at any age from 19 to 40, but the majority are finished at 32 or 33." This early retirement age means the taxman's usual annuity rules are waived for professional sportsmen. The rest of us may have to wait till 50 or later, but professional footballers can take a retirement annuity at any age from 35 onwards, which will contique to pay them an income until death.

As far as tax relief is concerned, professional sportsmen are subject to the same contribution limits and earnings cap as the rest of us. Paul Slade

Estate agents face a continuing lack of consumer confidence and a rise of alternative sales methods. Some are slowly emerging from the Dark Ages and claim househunting on the internet offers salvation. Felicity Connell investigates if this is really the case.

Estate ageots have been ontoriously slow to incorporate the latest in new technology, primarily in order to keep costs down. But whereas, once upon a time. reams of badly photocopied details proved adequate, those who want to sell our home and persuade us to buy another are now having to work harder to improve their service. Some have alighted on the World Wide Web as the way forward. Marcus Baldersion, from the Internet working party set up by the National Association of Estate Agents (NAEA), says: "The Internet is set to influence the commercial world with the same impact as electricity, the telephone and television.

The pace of change in information technology is such that estate agents could he left behind in business terms if they do not get to grips with the Internet now."

According to statistics, one in 10 households can already accesses the Internet and the number is growing. A search of the Net for properties to buy initially looks promising, but up to now there is little national coverage, with many sites devoid of instructions on how to use them. More can presently be gained from

While UK estate agents have so far been reluctant to invest in a system which is still in its infancy, and to which the majority of potential customers do not have access, huge investment is being made by the computer and television industries to bring the Internet out of the study and into the living room.

· PropertyLive is based on the NAEA's existing HomeLink service, designed to help people move from one area of the country to another. It provides access to properties offered for sale through 850 independent estate agents nationwide, via a visit to a local participating estate agent. Now, this information will be available from the home, via the Internet.

In addition, through integration with government databases, customers will sooo be able to find out essential property-related information - local schools. hospitals and leisure and transport facilities. New access to information will allow estate agents to speed up the sales process - to check title, carry out local searches and deal with land registry. As the service develops, online mortgages, conveyancing, insurance and other services may be made available, as the NAEA tries to turn the estate agent into a one-stop property

Everyone knows that Otaking out a mortgage may mean paying back many thousands of pounds more in interest than the capital they borrowed in the first place. Fewer people know that the amount of interest depends on how the capital repayments are calculated. Nic Cicutti explains the different methods.

Twenty years or so ago the choice of mortgage available to most borrowers was simple. To paraphrase Henry Ford, you could either have a repayment

This is the kind of mortgage where each year into the loan you repay a mixture of interest and capital. Gradually, the capital repayments increase relative to interest until by the end, most of the monthly payments involve the loan itself.

In the 1980s everything changed. Lenders introduced the interest-only loan, backed by a separate investment - typically an endowment policy, but also PEPs and tax-free pension lump

However, fears over whether endowments can pay off the entire loan in a low-inflation climate have led to the resurgence of direct repayment options. If nothing else, their supporters argue, repayments offer the certainty of meeting the full cost of the mortgage over the agreed

A survey by Harris Research for Yorkshire Bank earlier this year suggests that a third of people have no idea when their mortgages will be fully paid off. and more than 50 per cent have no idea what their exact repayments are or how they are calculated.

Typically, mortgage lenders will calculate the amount of capital to be repaid only at the end of a 12-month cycle, no matter how much has been repaid in the intervening period. This is known within the mortgage industry as the "annual rest" pe-

In effect, it means that borrowers who repay their mortgages each month are themselves loaning money to their lenders throughout the year, until their repayments are credited against the amount still outstanding.

The alternative is to credit part of the amount paid against the capital owed, as soon as it comes in, either monthly ("monthly rest") or daily ("dai-

Research by Yorkshire Bank, which operates the daily rest system, shows what that means. The bank calculates that if borrowers' monthly repayments were immediately set against the capital owed, savings of thousands of pounds in interest could be achieved.

On a typical £50,000 loan, repaid monthly at today's rate of 8.45 per cent, monthly repayments of £373.74 would give total interest savings of £4,459 their charging system is unfair. Some, while still operating an annual rest system, argue that they are prepared to be flexible to help people pay off their loans early,

Andrew Stinson, from Barclays Mortgages information unit, says: "We are prepared to allow people to make lump sums reductions of £1,000 or more on standard variable mortgages, without penalty, and payments will be adjusted downwards the following month to take the lower capital owed into account.

We are also ready to show flexibility with people who have fixed-rate mortgages, allowing them to pay up to twice their Lenders are increasingly normal monthly payments, thus reducing the term of the mort-

looking for is the chance to pay off their loan faster than the original limit. This may be for many reasons, including coming Nic Cicutti, personal finance edinto lump sums, perhaps as a result of bonuses.

PENNY IACKSON

Home hunters in London relatively short house hunt have flocked to Elephant & has ended with that rare Castle to buy an apartment in Metro Central, a revamped office block on New Keni Road.

Within two weeks of launching its final phase, Metro South, St George, the developer has sold 35 of the 100 studios and flats. Not surprisingly, its position close to Waterloo and the City and its competitive prices have all contributed to its success, but so has the pink pound.

Apparently, word of mouth among the gay community has boosted its popularity. "It has an American lifestyle flavour to it," says a man who lives in nearby Brixton. "They can see themselves as living in an episode of Friends. The gymnasium and swimming pool under one roof would be irresistible. Gay men like to colonise and have definitely taken up south of the rivет. It has all the space you get for the money. You have to have somewhere to put your rowing machine."

Lorna Vesty, a partner at Knight Frank, says the gay buyer is a major buying force in central urban developments. "They mirror the rismg importance of emptynesters in rural new developments," she says. "In the case of London, the usual rules apply - affordability and location are the two crucial issues for all buyers. Single people or those without children often like to be within easy reach and nightclubs and and restaurants," Metro South prices start at £67,950 and go up to £218,950 for a three bedroom, three-bathroom duplex. Sales centre: 0171 967 0545.

There are people who have been waiting years for the a competition for the largest perfect Hampshire house to sunflower grown on their come on to the market. So when the London-based Honeypot Home children's charity started its search there, it is not surprising it was met by gloomy faces. But the organisation's creature, a four-bedroom house in seven acres in the New Forest.

Compromise was the key. Four years of hard fund-raising to provide needy children with a break from home were a lesson on value for money. "The house is an unexciting Seventies building but it has a bungalow in the grounds, a flat above the garage, a swimming pool and a lake," the charity's founder, Lisa Nelson, says. We paid £430,000, £20,000 under the asking price and the district council were brilliant about granting change of use. All we need now are a lot of fairy godmothers to help us kit it out."

Most people's dream home is a Georgian rectory, and a dream it usually remains, says Kevin Allen of John D Wood's Lymington office. "A period house in a decent garden is as rare as hens' teeth. Anyone after that kind of house in the New Forest has to compromise. Prices here are still largely fuelled by the shortage of good houses for sale." An Edwardian-built neo-Georgian house, minus nooks and crannies, with a cottage, would be around £750,000.

Sunflowers have been doing good husiness this summer in west London. Rolfe East, the estate agency and lettings group, abandoned the traditional agent's board for one in the shape of a sunflower.

This unusual marketing campaign has met with approval, as well it might given the ugliness of a cluster of run-of-the mill boards. The agents are almost as keen to promote the real thing and have been running paich.

It finished this week as sunflowers begin to droop. So far a seven footer from Ealing is leading the field. A £200 prize will go to a school of the winner's choosing.

Growth of a legend: stages in the evolution of the Porsche. The latest is the best - and you can even hear the stereo

A beast, more beautiful than ever

There are better, faster, more beautiful cars than the Porsche 911. But there is none that serves up such a magical mix of sports car interaction, engine punch and live-wire behaviour. Gavin Green is smitten.

This is my favourite car. You don't so much drive a Porsche 911, as ride it. It is a barely tamed stallion, always oo the verge of unruliness. Yet if you concentrate, drive forcefully and drive well, there is no car that rewards its master so richly.

The 911 is terrifically tactile. Drive one, and nothing else is quite the same. It is also marvellously practical. No car is better made or more reliable. It is probably the world's only sports car that can be used every day, and do its job as uncomplainingly as an Escort.

And now, 34 years after its invention, there is a new one. There have been updates over the past three decades or so, revisions that have partly tamed the beast and made it more usable and comfortable. The last iteration, unveiled in 1994 and codenamed the 993, was undoubtedly the best. Until this one, the hrand new 911 - the best Porsche of the lot, and possibly the most desirable sports car in the world.

Although brand new - every panel is different, every mechanical component altered - the new 911 has been carefully designed to carry on the tradition. Its engine is nestled neatly in the tail, behind the rear axle line, which helps give the car such compact dimensions and such slingshot acceleration out of corners.

The downside is obvious: having all that weight out the back does not help handling balance. Most rival sports cars, as well as many cheaper ones (such as the MGF and Toyota MR2) have their engines in the middle, hetween cabin and rear wheels, in Formula One racing car-style. Others, typically, have front engines and rear drive, which - as with a bar-bell, heavy at both ends - at least gives some equilibrium to the whole.

The oew 911has a flat-six engine, an unusual

layout, as did its forebear. Again, it makes for compactness, and the most marvellous mechanical music at high revs - a hull-elephant bellow only a few feet behind you. The noise has always been part of the 911 mystique. The new flat-six engine, though, is watercooled, and those water jackets do partly dampen the orchestra. The old motor was air-cooled, like the old VW Beetle's motor, and thus there was little to muffle the tuneful cacopbony of those six cylinders reciprocating at crazy speeds. The new motor doesn't sound quite as distinctive, at least not until you've passed 6,000rpm on the big 911, bowever, is small, and feels small. That is central tacbometer. When you're cranking on, the engine is finally restored to full voice; there is just no finer automotive ensemble. And the new motor is more powerful and economical than the old model's. Porsche 911s have always been tolerably economical, belped by their light weight, relatively small engines (in sports car parlance) and small size.

Their smallness bas another attraction, Most supercars are too big, the upshots of needlessly vast engines trying to propel wastefully vast - but eye-catchingly extravagant - bodies to absurdhigh and largely academic maximum speeds.

Most current supercars are, in real conditions, slower than small hatchbacks, an upshot of their bulk and their awkward driving positions. The Lotus Esprit V8 £59,995. Flasher, faster but no other advantages over the Porsche. Now that the 911 has been replaced by a new model, the Esprit is the world's longest-lived supercar. And it oeeds replacing far more urgently than the Porsche one reason why rear-engined Porsches are raced successfully and, on public roads, are probably the fastest point-to-point cars in the world.

The new 911 is marginally bigger – 18.5cm longer, 3cm wider – but 50kg lighter than its predecessor. The greater size helps to make for greater cabin space. The 911 has more front seat room than many much bigger GTs, including the vast Jaguar XK8. The old 911 was cramped; the new one feels positively spacious. The rear seat room is still exiguous; useful only for small children and chattels. The boot is usefully bigger.

The biggest change, though, is in the way the new car drives. It is still a real 911. Its agility and explosive acceleration are still uncannily like that of its predecessor. But the hyperactivity has been leavened with a degree of restfulness. If you wish to cruise down a motorway - conditions in which the old 911 always demanded maximum attention, and provided minimal creature comforts - the new one is quiet, stable, and relaxing.

The old 911 wanted to play all the time. The new one gives you a hreak when you simply wish to cruise, or enjoy the music. And, yes, you can hear the stereo on a long run, rather than be continually serenaded by that chain-saw buzz. But when you want to play, the new one can party hard. The steering is deliciously sharp and doesn't huck and kick back on tight, humpy roads, as the old model's did. Instead, it rides the bumps and irregularities, and gives good clean feedback no matter what the speed or the road surface.

As before, you can balance the car on bends, using both the throttle - in charge of so much power, so instantly accessible - and the steering. And the car proves just so obedient and controllable and small, helped hy hrilliant hrakes. There is just no other car that can leave its driver so utterly intoxicated by its charms.

How MPVs took us all for a ride

Sales of MPV vehicles are booming, largely because they're regarded as more versatile than normal saloons or estates. But in one major area - probably the major area - they're a

MPVs, such as Espaces and Galaxys and Sharans, offer seveo seats, most of which can fold and swivel and till and slide, and change from lounge chair to picnic table at the merest pull of a lever. But key to their claim to versatility is that the seats can be removed completely - by that measure, they're about as practical as a backpack made of lead. Sure, if you've got strong enough hands, bad enough finger nails, and tough enough skin, you can just about perform the exertions and funger gymnastics required to remove the chairs. But to us mere mortals, it's far too much aggro. Most MPV owners I know stick to the seven- or five-seat format, and rarely change. In practice, the seating format is as rigid as a nuo's

Not only are the chairs of all MPVs - from the bahy Mercedes A-class to the class-topping new Renault Espace - awkward to remove and replace, hut what on earth do you do with them when they're out? Even if you own a garage, do you really want to put your posh velourcovered chaîrs in the corner, to gather dust?

And for us urban dwellers, who find it hard to liberate enough house space for our books let problem is even more acute. I suggested putting the rear-most chairs of a recent test Espace in our lounge, but Her Indoors insisted that the purple velour clashed with the cream Heal's three-piece suite. And she found the metal "legs" of the Espace seats unsightly.

Even if you manage to extract all the back seats from an Espace in order to carry that chest of drawers to grandpa's, what happens if grandpa and grandma waot to come home with you? The answer - sorry but I left the seats at home seems rather pathetic.

It's partly for the above reasons, and partly because my wife still can't come to terms with driving a glorified van. that we terms with), why buy a recently decided to buy a Mercedes estate?

If you wish to turn your estate from a cupboard carrier into a people carrier, it's a simple matter of folding rather than removing/replacing assuming, of course, that the MPV seats are nearby.

Fortunately, there's a new people carrier that doesn't require its owners to skin their knuckles every time they want to alter the seating arrangement, and unfortuoate grandparents to lie low in the rear. It's the new Vauxhall Zafira, and it's still a year away from the showroom. Vauxhall reckooed; quite sensibly, that it's far preferable to leave seats in than to take them away, so the back five seats of the new Zafira all fold.

The rear two seats fold flat into the floor, allowing the middle bench (which can seat three) to slide over them, if necessary. And the middle bench folds forward, out of the way, in the good ol' estate style. "It's just so much easier than the normal arrangement," Vauxhail/Opel's head of Hanenberger, told me at the receot Frankfurt Show, where the Zafira was unveiled. (Quite where this puls the recently

The Zafira is a small MPV - it's of Renault Scenic rather than Renault Espace exterior size - and it strikes me as being potentially the biggest leap forward in MPVs since the original Espace, 13 years ago. According to Which?, 80 per cent of us will suffer from back trouble at some time in our lives. Driving is widely blamed. Spend more than half your working day at the wheel and you are six times more likely than non-drivers to be off work, according to a survey by Loughborough University. In another study, lorry drivers were found to be 25 times more prone to a slipped disc.

So what's wrong with our car seats? Have the manufacturers got them wrong? John Gorman, of Iliac Design, believes they have. "All cars seats are designed on completely the wrong principles," be says.

Gorman - a chartered engineer before he became a qualified chiropractor and seat maker - argues that modern car seats with fashionably prominent lumbar support, widely regarded as good for the spine, exacerbate back trouble. Gorman, who self-bealed his own sports-aggravated back problems, asserts that lumhar padding causes the backbone to bend more, not less, just above where it connects with the pelvis. It is here that most serious back trouble occurs.

It was obvious to Gorman, as a mechanical engineer, that lumbar padding was not the answer. In countering the pelvis's natural tendency to tilt backwards under body weight when sitting upright - as in a car or at your desk - the backbone levers itself into a double bend. opening up the base joints. The greater the angle between each vertebra, the greater the strain - and the higher the like-Ithood of back trouble.

this harmful effect is clearly illustrated in an Iliac video. It also shows that those postures regarded as correct - sitting up straight and not stumping - defy nature. Relaxing with an evenly curved spine, as in squatting on your beels or sloucbing in a chair, is good for your back. It's no coincidence that lower back trouble is rare in third-world countries where there are few drivers or office workers. Gorman's solution to the problem is simple. Do away with the spine-distorting lumbar padding and provide in-

Iliac Design's 'pelvic posture' seats (those for office use are already in production) are quite distinctive. The pelvic support bulges low down in a sort of vee formation at the base of the hackrest. Little or no pressure is applied to the lumbar region just above.

I tried two of Gorman's experimental pelvic seats. That in a Citroen Xantia bad particularly prominent V-shaped pelvic padding. The benefits were soon apparent. The pelvic

lliac reports favourable reactions from most drivers wbo have tried its seats. Pending the availability of car scats built to bis pelvic posture principle, Gorman recommends portable padding - and plenty of slouching and crouching, just as nature intended. If your car has adjustable lumbar support, sei it to the minimum.

MY WORST CAR/PHILIP MADOC

The vanishing Stag cost me dear

It was called the Triumph Stag but was nicknamed the Snag. Mine had more than its fair

To be honest I knew nothing about these cars. The only reason I chose it was because it was a convertible. I am a passionate motorcyclist - 1 love to see the sky and feel the wind and an open-topped car is the best compromise.

The Stag could only have been about three years old when I bought it but it quickly became apparent that the engine had serious problems. Now I'm not a mechanic, so I took it to a specialist and they recommended that the sick V8 should be swapped for a Rover engine. I arranged to drop it off at a garage in Hertfordshire and trusted them to get on with the job.

managed to keep in touch with the garage by telephoning them at least every other weekend. They kept telling me what I wanted to hear so the progress sounded promising.

Unfortunately I was in no position to check the situation personally, which was my biggest mistake. After six months though I became very suspicious and visited the premises one Saturday morn-

They bad hardly started work on the car and worse than that, it had gone missing. There was no trace of it, so I had to call in the police. Eventually it was found in a garage in south

London. No one knew how long it had been there. I strongly suspect it bad been there most of the time. It all got a bit messy because the proprietor was eventually taken to court and fined.

There was no happy ending for me though as 1 never got any money back and worst of all never even drove the Stag: Thad to sell a half-finished car. It was a very unpleasant experience and one I will never forget.

The Stag did not put me off convertibles - I have bad a succession of open-topped cars ever since. My first love is still motorcycles. None of them have ever given me as much grief as that awful Spag.

Philip Madoc is appearing in 'A Mind to Kill', on Channel 5 on Saturdays at 9pm. He was talking to James Ruppert.
